

ANAN (LIAPPEZAU

In vain were the well-meant condescensions of Sir Thomas, and all the officious prognostications of Mrs. Norris that she would be a good girl (page 16)

Mansfield Park

JANE AUSTEN

Twelve colored illustrations by C. E. and H. M. Brock

PHILADELPHIA

THE RITTENHOUSE CLASSICS

MACRAE · SMITH · COMPANY PUBLISHERS

DISCARDED BY TML

8867

FAUS

INTENARY JUNIOR COLLEGE

PREFACE

by Jane auster

Punaputa Jaria

MR. AUSTEN-LEIGH tells us that this novel, like Emma and Persuasion, was written between Feb. 1811 and Aug. 1814. It was published in 1814, and the first edition was all sold by the November of that year.

The following editions appeared in Miss Austen's life-time:---

MANSFIELD PARK: a Novel, in three volumes. By the author of "Sense and Sensibility" and "Pride and Prejudice." London: Printed for T. Egerton, Military Library, Whitehall. 1814.

[Vols. I. and III. printed by G. Sidney, Northumberland Street, Strand; Vol. II. by C. Roworth, Bell-yard, Temple Bar.]

B. MANSFIELD PARK: a Novel, in three volumes. By the author of "Pride and Prejudice." Second Edition. London: Printed for J. Murray, Albemarle Street. 1816.

[Vol. 1. printed by J. Moyes, Greville Street, Hatton Garden, London; Vol. II. by C. Roworth, Bell-yard, Temple Bar; Vol. III. appears to have been set up by a third printer, though no name is given.]

[v]

CENTENARY JUNIOR COLLEGE

PREFACE

The book has since been brought out by various publishers, and in several series. This edition is printed from B. In the few cases where errors have crept into the text, the reading of A is followed, and this is indicated by the words being enclosed in square brackets. Any other deviations from the text of B are explained in footnotes.

Miss Austen alludes in her letters to her brother Henry's opinion of this book. "March 2.—His approbation is hitherto even equal to my wishes. He says it is different from the other two, but does not appear to think it at all inferior. He has only married Mrs. R. I am afraid he has got through the most entertaining part. He took to Lady B. and Mrs. N. most kindly, and gives great praise to the drawing of the characters. He understands them all, likes Fanny; and, I think, foresees how it will all be. . . . He is going on with 'Mansfield Park.' He admires H. Crawford: I mean properly, as a clever, pleasant man." Again, on March 5 .- " Henry has this moment said he likes my M.P. better and better; he is in the third volume. I believe now he has changed his mind as to foreseeing the end; he said yesterday, at least, that he defied anybody to say whether H. C. would be reformed or would forget Fanny in a fortnight."

On another occasion Miss Austen also writes [vi]

PREFACE

that one of her friends had "a great idea of being Fanny Price," and that Edmund Bertram, like her other special favourite, Mr. Knightley, was "very far from being what I know English gentlemen often are." She told her family that the "something considerable" which Mrs. Norris contributed to William Price's outfit was one pound.

.

.

ILLUSTRATIONS

PART I

In vain were the well-meant condescensions of Sir Thomas, and all the officious prognostications of Mrs. Norris that she would be a good girl . Frontispie
FACING PA The harp arrived and she played with the greatest oblig-	GE
	92
"I am come to make my own apologies for keeping you walting	96
"Miss Price all alone!" and "My dear Fanny, how comes this?" were the first salutations 1	38
He could not help giving Mrs. Norris a hint that her advice might have been interposed	66
Dr. Grant himself went out with an umbrella 2	92

PART II

Sir Thomas brought him to her, saying that she was to lead the way and open the ball	58
Then returning to her seat to finish a note which she was previously engaged in writing for that stupid
woman's service	88
She could not abstract her mind five minutes; she was forced to listen; his reading was capital	146
"I know you have something on your mind. I know what you are thinking of"	160
The complete in his lieutenant's uniform, and all the taller and more graceful for it	216
He attended to them to the last and left them only at the door of their own house	256

Mansfield Park

A

CHAPTER I

BOUT thirty years ago, Miss Maria Ward, of Huntingdon, with only seven thousand pounds, had the good luck to captivate Sir Thomas Bertram, of Mansfield Park, in the county of Northampton, and to be thereby raised to the rank of a baronet's lady, with all the comforts and consequences of an handsome house and large income. All Huntingdon exclaimed on the greatness of the match, and her uncle, the lawyer, himself, allowed her to be at least three thousand pounds short of any equitable claim to it. She had two sisters to be benefited by her elevation; and such of their acquaintance as thought Miss Ward and Miss Frances quite as handsome as Miss Maria, did not scruple to predict their marrying with almost equal advantage. But there certainly are not so many men of large fortune in the world as there are pretty women to deserve them. Miss Ward, at the end of half-a-dozen years, found herself obliged to be attached to the Rev. Mr Norris, a friend of her brother-in-law, with scarcely any private fortune, and Miss Frances fared vet worse. Miss Ward's match, indeed, when it came to the point, was not contemptible; Sir Thomas being happily able to give his friend an income in the living of Mansfield; and Mr and Mrs Norris began their career of conjugal felicity with very little less than a thousand ayear. But Miss Frances married, in the common phrase, to disoblige her family, and by fixing on a lieutenant of marines, without education, fortune, or connections, did it very thoroughly. She could hardly have made a more untoward choice. Sir Thomas Bertram had interest, which, from principle as well as pride-from a general wish of doing right, and a desire of seeing all that were connected with him in situations of respectability, he would have been glad to exert for the advantage of Lady Bertram's sister; but her husband's profession was such as no interest could reach; and before he had time to devise any other method of assisting them, an absolute breach between the sisters had taken place. It was the natural result of the conduct of each party, and such as a very imprudent marriage almost always produces. To save herself from useless remonstrance, Mrs Price never wrote to her family on the subject till actually married. Lady Bertram, who was a woman of very tran-[2] quil feelings, and a temper remarkably easy and indolent, would have contented herself with merely giving up her sister, and thinking no more of the matter; but Mrs Norris had a spirit of activity, which could not be satisfied till she had written a long and angry letter to Fanny, to point out the folly of her conduct, and threaten her with all its possible ill consequences. Mrs Price, in her turn, was injured and angry; and an answer, which comprehended each sister in its bitterness, and bestowed such very disrespectful reflections on the pride of Sir Thomas, as Mrs Norris could not possibly keep to herself, put an end to all intercourse between them for a considerable period.

Their homes were so distant, and the circles in which they moved so distinct, as almost to preclude the means of ever hearing of each other's existence during the eleven following years, or, at least, to make it very wonderful to Sir Thomas, that Mrs Norris should ever have it in her power to tell them, as she now and then did, in an angry voice, that Fanny had got another child. By the end of eleven years, however, Mrs Price could no longer afford to cherish pride or resentment, or to lose one connection that might possibly assist her. A large and still increasing family, an husband disabled for active service, but not the less equal to company and good liquor, and a very small income to supply their wants, made her eager to regain the friends she had so carelessly sacrificed; and she addressed Lady Bertram in a letter which spoke so much contrition and despondence, such a superfluity of children, and such a want of almost everything else, as could not but dispose them all to a reconciliation. She was preparing for her ninth lying-in; and after bewailing the circumstance, and imploring their countenance as sponsors to the expected child, she could not conceal how important she felt they might be to the future maintenance of the eight already in being. Her eldest was a boy of ten years, a fine spirited fellow, who longed to be out in the world; but what could she do? Was there any chance of his being hereafter useful to Sir Thomas in the concerns of his West Indian property? No situation would be beneath him; or what did Sir Thomas think of Woolwich? or how could a boy be sent out to the East?

The letter was not unproductive. It re-established peace and kindness. Sir Thomas sent friendly advice and professions, Lady Bertram dispatched money and baby-linen, and Mrs Norris wrote the letters.

Such were its immediate effects, and within a twelve-month a more important advantage to Mrs Price resulted from it. Mrs Norris was often observing to the others that she could not get her poor sister and her family out of her head, and that, much as they had all done for her, she seemed to be wanting to do more; and at length she could not but own it to be her wish, that poor Mrs Price should be relieved from the charge and expense of one child entirely out of her great number.

"What if they were among them to undertake the care of her eldest daughter, a girl now nine years old, of an age to require more attention than her poor mother could possibly give? The trouble and expense of it to them would be nothing, compared with the benevolence of the action." Lady Bertram agreed with her instantly. "I think we cannot do better," said she; "let us send for the child."

Sir Thomas could not give so instantaneous and unqualified a consent. He debated and hesitated: it was a serious charge; a girl so brought up must be adequately provided for, or there would be cruelty instead of kindness in taking her from her family. He thought of his own four children, of his two sons, of cousins in love, &c.; but no sooner had he deliberately begun to state his objections, than Mrs Norris interrupted him with a reply to them all, whether stated or not.

"My dear Sir Thomas, I perfectly comprehend you, and do justice to the generosity and delicacy of your notions, which, indeed, are quite of a piece with your general conduct; and I entirely agree with you in the main as to the propriety of doing everything one could by way of providing for a child one had in a manner taken into one's own hands; and I am sure I should be the last person in the world to withhold my mite upon such an occasion. Having no children of my own, who should I look to in any little matter I may ever have to bestow, but the children of my sisters? and I am sure Mr Norris is too just-but you know I am a woman of few words and professions. Do not let us be frightened from a good deed by a trifle. Give a girl an education, and introduce her properly into the world, and ten to one but she has the means of settling well, without farther expense to anybody. A niece of our's, Sir Thomas, I may say, or, at least, of your's, would not grow up in this neighbourhood without many advantages. I don't say she would be so handsome as her cousins. I dare say she would not: but she would be introduced into the society of this country under such very favourable circumstances as, in all human probability, would get her a creditable establishment. You are thinking of your sons; but do not you know that of all things upon earth that is the least likely to happen, brought up as they would be, always together like brothers and sisters? It is morally impossible. I never knew an instance of it. It is, in fact the only sure way of providing against the connection. Suppose her a pretty girl, and seen by Tom or Edmund for the first time seven years hence, and I dare say there would be mischief. The very idea of her having been suffered to grow up at a distance from us all in poverty and neglect, would be enough to make either of the dear, sweet-tempered boys in love with her. But breed her up with them from this time, and suppose her even to have the beauty of an angel, and she will never be more to either than a sister."

"There is a great deal of truth in what you say," replied Sir Thomas, "and far be it from me to throw any fanciful impediment in the way of a plan which would be so consistent with the relative situations of each. I only meant to observe, that it ought not to be lightly engaged in, and that to make it really serviceable to Mrs Price, and creditable to ourselves, we must secure to the child, or consider ourselves engaged to secure to her hereafter, as circumstances may arise, the provision of a gentlewoman, if no such establishment should offer as you are so sanguine in expecting."

"I thoroughly understand you," cried Mrs Norris; "you are everything that is generous and considerate, and I am sure we shall never disagree on this point. Whatever I can do, as you well know, I am always ready enough to do for the good of those I love; and, though I could never feel for this little girl the hundredth part of the regard I bear your own dear children, nor consider her, in any respect, so much my own, I should hate myself if I were capable of neglecting her. Is not she a sister's child? and could I bear to see her want while I had a bit of bread to give her? My dear Sir Thomas, with all my faults I have a warm heart; and, poor as I am, would rather deny myself the necessaries of life than do an ungenerous thing. So, if you are not against it, I will write to my poor sister to-morrow, and make the proposal; and, as soon as matters are settled, I will engage to get the child to Mansfield; you shall have no trouble about it. My own trouble, you know, I never regard. I will send Nanny to London on purpose, and she may have a bed at her cousin the saddler's, and the child be appointed to meet her there. They may easily get her from Portsmouth to town by the coach, under the care of any creditable person that may chance to be going. I dare say there is always some reputable tradesman's wife or other going up."

Except to the attack on Nanny's cousin, Sir Thomas no longer made any objection, and a more respectable, though less economical rendezvous being accordingly substituted, everything was considered as settled, and the pleasures of so benevolent a scheme were already enjoyed. The division of gratifying sensations ought not, in strict justice, to have been equal; for Sir Thomas was fully resolved to be the real and consistent patron of the selected child, and Mrs Norris had not the least intention of being at any expense whatever in her maintenance. As far as walking, talking, and contriving reached, she was thoroughly benevolent, and nobody knew better how to dictate liberality to others; but her love of money was equal to her love of directing, and she knew quite as well how to save her own as to spend that of her friends. Having married on a narrower income than she had been used to look forward to, she had, from the first, fancied a very strict line of economy necessary; and what was begun as a matter of prudence, soon grew into a matter of choice, as an object of that needful solicitude which there were no children to supply. Had there been a family to provide for, Mrs Norris might never have saved her money; but having no care of that kind, there was nothing to impede her frugality, or to lessen the comfort of making a yearly addition to an income which they had never lived up to. Under this infatuating principle, counteracted by no real affection for her sister, it was impossible for her to aim at more than the credit of projecting and arranging so expensive a charity; though perhaps she might so little know herself, as to walk home to the Parsonage, after this conversation, in the happy belief of being the most liberal-minded sister and aunt in the world.

When the subject was brought forward again, her views were more fully explained; and, in reply to Lady Bertram's calm inquiry of "Where shall the child come to first, sister, to you or to us?" Sir Thomas heard with some surprise, that it would be totally out of Mrs Norris's power to take any share in the personal charge of her. He had been considering her as a particularly welcome addition at the Parsonage, as a desirable companion to an aunt who had no children of her own; but he found himself wholly mistaken. Mr. Norris was sorry to say, that the little girl's staying with them, at least as things then were, was quite out of the question. Poor Mr Norris's indifferent state of health made it an impossibility; he could no more bear the noise of a child than he could fly; if, indeed, he should ever get well of his gouty complaints, it would be a different matter; she should then be glad to take her turn, and think nothing of the inconvenience; but just now, poor Mr Norris took up every moment of her time, and the very mention of such a thing she was sure would distract him.

"Then she had better come to us," said Lady [10]

Bertram, with the utmost composure. After a short pause, Sir Thomas added with dignity, "Yes; let her home be in this house. We will endeavour to do our duty by her, and she will, at least, have the advantage of companions of her own age, and of a regular instructress."

"Very true," cried Mrs Norris, "which are both very important considerations; and it will be just the same to Miss Lee, whether she has three girls to teach, or only two-there can be no difference. I only wish I could be more useful; but you see I do all in my power. I am not one of those that spare their own trouble; and Nanny shall fetch her, however it may put me to inconvenience to have my chief counsellor away for three days. I suppose, sister, you will put the child in the little white attic, near the old nurseries. It will be much the best place for her, so near Miss Lee, and not far from the girls, and close by the housemaids, who could either of them help to dress her, you know, and take care of her clothes, for I suppose you would not think it fair to expect Ellis to wait on her as well as the others. Indeed, I do not see that you could possibly place her anywhere else."

Lady Bertram made no opposition.

"I hope she will prove a well-disposed girl," continued Mrs Norris, "and be sensible of her uncommon good fortune in having such friends."

"Should her disposition be really bad," said Sir Thomas, "we must not, for our own children's sake, continue her in the family; but there is no reason to expect so great an evil. We shall probably see much to wish altered in her, and must prepare ourselves for gross ignorance, some meanness of opinions, and very distressing vulgarity of manner; but these are not incurable faults; nor, I trust, can they be dangerous for her associates. Had my daughters been younger than herself, I should have considered the introduction of such a companion as a matter of very serious moment; but, as it is, I hope there can be nothing to fear for them, and everything to hope for her, from the association."

"That is exactly what I think," cried Mrs Norris, "and what I was saying to my husband this morning. It will be an education for the child, said I, only being with her cousins; if Miss Lee taught her nothing, she would learn to be good and clever from them."

"I hope she will not tease my poor pug," said Lady Bertram: "I have but just got Julia to leave it alone."

"There will be some difficulty in our way, Mrs Norris," observed Sir Thomas, "as to the distinction proper to be made between the girls as they grow up: how to preserve in the minds of my daughters the consciousness of what they are, without making them think too lowly of their cousin; and how, without depressing her spirits too far, to make her remember that she is not a Miss Bertram. I should wish to see them very good friends, and would, on no account, authorize in my girls the smallest degree of arrogance towards their relation; but still they cannot be equals. Their rank, fortune, rights, and expectations, will always be different. It is a point of great delicacy, and you must assist us in our endeavours to choose exactly the right line of conduct."

Mrs Norris was quite at his service; and though she perfectly agreed with him as to its being a most difficult thing, encouraged him to hope that between them it would be easily managed.

It will be readily believed that Mrs Norris did not write to her sister in vain. Mrs Price seemed rather surprised that a girl should be fixed on, when she had so many fine boys, but accepted the offer most thankfully, assuring them of her daughter's being a very well-disposed, goodhumoured, girl, and trusting they would never have cause to throw her off. She spoke of her farther as somewhat delicate and puny, but was sanguine in the hope of her being materially better for change of air. Poor woman! she probably thought change of air might agree with many of her children.

CHAPTER II

THE little girl performed her long journey in safety; and at Northampton was met by Mrs Norris, who thus regaled in the credit of being foremost to welcome her, and in the importance of leading her in to the others, and recommending her to their kindness.

Fanny Price was at this time just ten years old, and though there might not be much in her first appearance to captivate, there was, at least, nothing to disgust her relations. She was small of her age, with no glow of complexion, nor any other striking beauty; exceedingly timid and shy, and shrinking from notice; but her air, though awkward, was not vulgar, her voice was sweet, and when she spoke her countenance was pretty. Sir Thomas and Lady Bertram received her very kindly; and Sir Thomas, seeing how much she needed encouragement, tried to be all that was conciliating; but he had to work against a most untoward gravity of deportment; and Lady Bertram, without taking half so much trouble, or speaking one word where he spoke ten, by the mere aid of a good-humoured smile, became immediately the less awful character of the two.

The young people were all at home, and sustained their share in the introduction very well, with much good humour, and no embarrassment, at least on the part of the sons, who, at seventeen and sixteen, and tall of their age, had all the grandeur of men in the eyes of their little cousin. The two girls were more at a loss from being younger and in greater awe of their father, who addressed them on the occasion with rather an injudicious particularity. But they were too much used to company and praise, to have anything like natural shyness; and their confidence increasing from their cousin's total want of it, they were soon able to take a full survey of her face and her frock in easy indifference.

They were a remarkably fine family, the sons very well-looking, the daughters decidedly handsome, and all of them well-grown and forward of their age, which produced as striking a difference between the cousins in person, as education had given to their address; and no one would have supposed the girls so nearly of an age as they really were. There was in fact but two years between the youngest and Fanny. Julia Bertram was only twelve, and Maria but a year older. The little visitor meanwhile was as unhappy as possible. Afraid of everybody, ashamed of herself, and longing for the home she had left, she knew not how to look up, and could scarcely speak to be heard, or without crying. Mrs Norris had been talking to her the whole way from Northampton of her wonderful good fortune, and the extraordinary degree of gratitude and good behaviour which it ought to produce, and her consciousness of misery was therefore increased by the idea of its being a wicked thing for her not to be happy. The fatigue, too, of so long a journey, became soon no triffing evil. In vain were the well-meant condescensions of Sir Thomas, and all the officious prognostications of Mrs Norris that she would be a good girl; in vain did Lady Bertram smile and make her sit on the sofa with herself and pug, and vain was even the sight of a gooseberry tart towards giving her comfort; she could scarcely swallow two mouthfuls before tears interrupted her, and sleep seeming to be her likeliest friend, she was taken to finish her sorrows in bed.

"This is not a very promising beginning," said Mrs Norris, when Fanny had left the room. "After all that I said to her as we came along, I thought she would have behaved better; I told her how much might depend upon her acquitting herself well at first. I wish there may not be a little sulkiness of temper—her poor mother had a good deal: but we must make allowances for such a child;—and I do not know that her being sorry to leave her home is really against her, for, with all its faults, it was her home, and she cannot as yet understand how much she has changed for the better; but then there is moderation in all things."

[16]

It required a longer time, however, than Mrs Norris was inclined to allow, to reconcile Fanny to the novelty of Mansfield Park, and the separation from everybody she had been used to. Her feelings were very acute, and too little understood to be properly attended to. Nobody meant to be unkind, but nobody put themselves out of their way to secure her comfort.

The holiday allowed to the Miss Bertrams the next day, on purpose to afford leisure for getting acquainted with, and entertaining their young cousin, produced little union. They could not but hold her cheap on finding that she had but two sashes, and had never learned French; and when they perceived her to be little struck with the duet [they] were so good as to play, they could do no more than make her a generous present of some of their least valued toys, and leave her to herself, while they adjourned to whatever might be the favourite holiday sport of the moment, making artificial flowers or wasting gold paper.

Fanny, whether near or from her cousins, whether in the school-room, the drawing-room, or the shrubbery, was equally forlorn, finding something to fear in every person and place. She was disheartened by Lady Bertram's silence, awed by Sir Thomas's grave looks, and quite overcome by Mrs Norris's admonitions. Her elder cousins mortified her by reflections on her size, and abashed her by noticing her shyness: Miss Lee wondered at her ignorance, and the maid-servants sneered at her clothes; and when to these sorrows was added the idea of the brothers and sisters among whom she had always been important as playfellow, instructress, and nurse, the despondence that sunk her little heart was severe.

The grandeur of the house astonished, but could not console her. The rooms were too large for her to move in with ease; whatever she touched she expected to injure, and she crept about in constant terror of something or other; often retreating towards her own chamber to cry; and the little girl who was spoken of in the drawing-room when she left it at night, as seeming so desirably sensible of her peculiar good fortune, ended every day's sorrows by sobbing herself to sleep. A week had passed in this way, and no suspicion of it conveyed by her quiet passive manner, when she was found one morning by her cousin Edmund, the youngest of the sons, sitting crying on the attic stairs.

"My dear little cousin," said he, with all the gentleness of an excellent nature, "what can be the matter?" And sitting down by her, was at great pains to overcome her shame in being so surprised, and persuade her to speak openly.

[18]

"Was she ill? or was anybody angry with her? or had she quarrelled with Maria and Julia? or was she puzzled about anything in her lesson that he could explain? Did she, in short, want anything he could possibly get her, or do for her?" For a long while no answer could be obtained beyond a "no, no—not at all—no, thank you;" but he still persevered; and no sooner had he begun to revert to her own home, than her increased sobs explained to him where the grievance lay. He tried to console her.

"You are sorry to leave mamma, my dear little Fanny," said he, "which shows you to be a very good girl: but you must remember that you are with relations and friends, who all love you, and wish to make you happy. Let us walk out in the park, and you shall tell me all about your brothers and sisters."

On pursuing the subject, he found that, dear as all these brothers and sisters generally were, there was one among them who ran more in her thoughts than the rest. It was William whom she talked of most, and wanted most to see. William, the eldest, a year older than herself, her constant companion and friend; her advocate with her mother (of whom he was the darling) in every distress. "William did not like she should come away; he had told her he should miss her very much indeed.—"But William will write to you, I dare say."—"Yes, he had promised he would, but he had told her to write first."—"And when shall you do it?" She hung her head and answered, hesitatingly, "She did not know; she had not any paper."

"If that be all your difficulty, I will furnish you with paper and every other material, and you may write your letter whenever you choose. Would it make you happy to write to William?"

"Yes, very."

"Then let it be done now. Come with me into the breakfast-room, we shall find everything there, and be sure of having the room to ourselves."

"But, cousin, will it go to the post?"

"Yes, depend upon me it shall: it shall go with the other letters; and, as your uncle will frank it, it will cost William nothing."

"My uncle!" repeated Fanny, with a frightened look.

"Yes, when you have written the letter, I will take it to my father to frank."

Fanny thought it a bold measure, but offered no farther resistance; and they went together into the breakfast-room, where Edmund prepared her paper, and ruled her lines with all the good-will that her brother could himself have felt, and probably with somewhat more exactness. He continued with her the whole time of her writing, o assist her with his penknife or his orthography, as either were wanted: and added to these attentions, which she felt very much, a kindness to her prother which delighted her beyond all the rest. He wrote with his own hand his love to his cousin William, and sent him half a guinea under the seal. Fanny's feelings on the occasion were such as she believed herself incapable of expressing; out her countenance and a few artless words fully conveyed all their gratitude and delight, and her cousin began to find her an interesting object. He talked to her more, and, from all that she said, was convinced of her having an affectionate neart, and a strong desire of doing right; and he could perceive her to be farther entitled to attenion, by great sensibility of her situation, and great timidity. He had never knowingly given her pain, but he now felt that she required more positive kindness and with that view endeavoured, n the first place, to lessen her fears of them all, and gave her especially a great deal of good dvice as to playing with Maria and Julia, and being as merry as possible.

[20]

From this day Fanny grew more comfortable. She felt that she had a friend, and the kindness of her cousin Edmund gave her better spirits with everybody else. The place became less trange, and the people less formidable; and if here were some amongst them whom she could not cease to fear, she began at least to know their ways, and to catch the best manner of conforming to them. The little rusticities and awkward nesses which had at first made grievous inroads or the tranquillity of all, and not least of herself necessarily wore away, and she was no longer materially afraid to appear before her uncle, not did her Aunt Norris's voice make her start very much. To her cousins she became occasionally ar acceptable companion. Though unworthy, from inferiority of age and strength, to be their constant associate, their pleasures and schemes were sometimes of a nature to make a third very use ful, especially when that third was of an obliging vielding temper; and they could not but own when their aunt inquired into her faults, or their brother Edmund urged her claims to their kind ness, that "Fanny was good-natured enough."

Edmund was uniformly kind himself; and she had nothing worse to endure on the part of Tom than that sort of merriment which a young man of seventeen will always think fair with a child of ten. He was just entering into life, full of spirits, and with all the liberal dispositions of an eldest son, who feels born only for expense and enjoyment. His kindness to his little cousin was consistent with his situation and rights: he made her some very pretty presents, and laughed at her

As her appearance and spirits improved, Sin [22]

Thomas and Mrs Norris thought with greater satisfaction of their benevolent plan; and it was pretty soon decided between them that though far from clever, she showed a tractable disposition, and seemed likely to give them little trouble. A mean opinion of her abilities was not confined to them. Fanny could read, work, and write, but she had been taught nothing more; and as her cousins found her ignorant of many things with which they had been long familiar, they thought her prodigiously stupid, and for the first two or three weeks were continually bringing some fresh report of it into the drawing-room. "Dear mamma, only think, my cousin cannot put the map of Europe together-or my cousin cannot tell the principal rivers in Russia-or she never heard of Asia Minor-or she does not know the difference between water-colours and crayons! How strange! Did you ever hear anything so stupid?"

"My dear," their considerate aunt would reply, "it is very bad, but you must not expect everybody to be as forward and quick at learning as yourself."

"But, aunt, she is really so very ignorant! Do you know, we asked her last night, which way she would go to get to Ireland; and she said, she should cross to the Isle of Wight. She thinks of nothing but the Isle of Wight, and she calls it the Island, as if there were no other island in the world. I am sure I should have been ashamed of myself, if I had not known better long before I was so old as she is. I cannot remember the time when I did not know a great deal that she has not the least notion of yet. How long ago it is, aunt, since we used to repeat the chronological order of the kings of England, with the dates of their accession, and most of the principal events of their reigns!"

"Yes," added the other; "and of the Roman emperors as low as Severus; besides a great deal of the heathen mythology, and all the metals, semi-metals, planets, and distinguished philosophers."

"Very true, indeed, my dears, but you are blessed with wonderful memories, and your poor cousin has probably none at all. There is a vast deal of difference in memories, as well as in everything else, and therefore you must make allowance for your cousin, and pity her deficiency. And remember that, if you are ever so forward and clever yourselves, you should always be modest; for, much as you know already, there is a great deal more for you to learn."

"Yes, I know there is, till I am seventeen. But I must tell you another thing of Fanny, so odd and so stupid. Do you know, she says she does not want to learn either music or drawing."

[24]

"To be sure, my dear, that is very stupid indeed, ad shows a great want of genius and emulation. ut, all things considered, I do not know whether is not as well that it should be so, for, though ou know (owing to me) your papa and mama re so good as to bring her up with you, it is not c all necessary that she should be as accomplished a you are; on the contrary, it is much more esirable that there should be a difference."

Such were the counsels by which Mrs Norris sisted to form her nieces' minds; and it is not ery wonderful that, with all their promising talnts and early information, they should be enrely deficient in the less common acquirements f self-knowledge, generosity, and humility. In verything but disposition, they were admirably aught. Sir Thomas did not know what was vanting, because, though a truly anxious father, e was not outwardly affectionate, and the reerve of his manner expressed all the flow of their pirits before him.

To the education of her daughters Lady Berram paid not the smallest attention. She had ot time for such cares. She was a woman who pent her days in sitting, nicely dressed, on a sofa, oing some long piece of needle-work, of little se and no beauty, thinking more of her pug than er children, but very indulgent to the latter, when it did not put herself to inconvenience, guided in everything important by Sir Thomas and in smaller concerns by her sister. Had she possessed greater leisure for the service of her girls, she would probably have supposed it unnecessary, for they were under the care of a governess, with proper masters, and could want nothing more. As for Fanny's being stupid at learning, "she could only say it was very unlucky, but some people were stupid, and Fanny must take more pains: she did not know what else was to be done; and, except her being so dull, she must add she saw no harm in the poor little thing, and always found her very handy, and quick in carrying messages, and fetching what she wanted."

Fanny, with all her faults of ignorance and timidity, was fixed at Mansfield Park, and learning to transfer in its favour much of her attachment to her former home, grew up there not unhappily among her cousins. There was no positive ill-nature in Maria or Julia; and though Fanny was often mortified by their treatment of her, she thought too lowly of her own claims to feel injured by it.

From about the time of her entering the family, Lady Bertram, in consequence of a little illhealth, and a great deal of indolence, gave up the house in town, which she had been used to occupy every spring, and remained wholly in the country, leaving Sir Thomas to attend his duty in Parlianent, with whatever increase or diminution of comfort might arise from her absence. In the country, therefore, the Miss Bertrams continued o exercise their memories, practise their duets, and grow tall and womanly: and their father saw hem becoming in person, manner, and accomplishments, everything that could satisfy his anxiety. His eldest son was careless and extravagant, and had already given him much uneasiness; but his other children promised him nothing out good. His daughters, he felt, while they etained the name of Bertram, must be giving it new grace, and in quitting it, he trusted, would extend its respectable alliances; and the character of Edmund, his strong good sense and uprightness of mind, bid most fairly for utility, honour, and happiness to himself and all his connections. He was to be a clergyman.

[26]

Amid the cares and the complaceny which his own children suggested, Sir Thomas did not forget to do what he could for the children of Mrs Price: he assisted her liberally in the education and disposal of her sons as they became old enough for a determinate pursuit: and Fanny, though almost totally separated from her family, was sensible of the truest satisfaction in hearing of any kindness towards them, or of anything at all promising in their situation or conduct. Once, and once only in the course of many years, had she the happiness of being with William. Of th rest she saw nothing; nobody seemed to think o her ever going amongst them again, even for visit, nobody at home seemed to want her; bu William determining, soon after her removal, t be a sailor, was invited to spend a week with hi sister in Northamptonshire, before he went to sea Their eager affection in meeting, their exquisit delight in being together, their hours of happ mirth, and moments of serious conference, ma be imagined; as well as the sanguine views and spirits of the boy even to the last, and the miser of the girl when he left her. Luckily the visi happened in the Christmas holidays, when sh could directly look for comfort to her cousin Edmund; and he told her such charming thing of what William was to do, and be hereafter, in consequence of his profession, as made her grad ually admit that the separation might have som use. Edmund's friendship never failed her: hi leaving Eton for Oxford made no change in hi kind disposition, and only afforded more fre quent opportunities of proving them. Withou any display of doing more than the rest, or any fear of doing too much, he was always true to he interests, and considerate of her feelings, trying to make her good qualities understood, and to conquer the diffidence which prevented their being more apparent; giving her advice, consolation and encouragement.

[28]

Kept back as she was by everybody else, his single support could not bring her forward; but his attentions were otherwise of the highest importance in assisting the improvement of her mind, and extending its pleasures. He knew her to be clever, to have a quick apprehension as well as good sense, and a fondness for reading, which, properly directed must be an education in itself. Miss Lee taught her French, and heard her read the daily portion of history; but he recommended the books which charmed her leisure hours, he encouraged her taste, and corrected her judgment: he made reading useful by talking to her of what she read, and heightened its attraction by judicious praise. In return for such services, she loved him better than anybody in the world except William: her heart was divided between the two.

CHAPTER III

THE first event of any importance in the family was the death of Mr Norris, which happened when Fanny was about fifteen, and necessarily introduced alterations and novelties. Mrs Norris, on quitting the Parsonage, removed first to the Park, and afterwards to a small house of Sir Thomas's in the village, and consoled herself for the loss of her husband by considering that she could do very well without him; and for her reduction of income by the evident necessity of stricter economy.

[29]

The living was hereafter for Edmund; and, had his uncle died a few years sooner, it would have been duly given to some friend to hold till he were old enough for orders. But Tom's extravagance had, previous to that event, been so great, as to render a different disposal of the next presentation necessary, and the younger brother must help to pay for the pleasures of the elder. There was another family living actually held for Edmund: but though this circumstance had made the arrangement somewhat easier to Sir Thomas's conscience, he could not but feel it to be an act of injustice, and he earnestly tried to impress his eldest son with the same conviction, in the hope of its producing a better effect than anything he had yet been able to say or do.

"I blush for you, Tom," said he, in his most dignified manner; "I blush for the expedient which I am driven on, and I trust I may pity your feelings as a brother on the occasion. You have robbed Edmund for ten, twenty, thirty years, perhaps for life, of more than half the income which ought to be his. It may hereafter be in my power, or in your's (I hope it will), to procure him better preferment; but it must not be for-[30] gotten, that no benefit of that sort would have been beyond his natural claims on us, and that nothing can, in fact, be an equivalent for the certain advantage which he is now obliged to forego through the urgency of your debts."

Tom listened with some shame and some sorrow; but escaping as quickly as possible, could soon with cheerful selfishness reflect, 1st, that he had not been half so much in debt as some of his friends; 2dly, that his father had made a most tiresome piece of work of it; and, 3dly, that the future incumbent, whoever he might be, would, in all probability, die very soon.

On Mr Norris's death, the presentation became the right of a Dr Grant, who came consequently to reside at Mansfield; and on proving to be a hearty man of forty-five, seemed likely to disappoint Mr Bertram's calculations. But "no, he was a short-necked, apoplectic sort of fellow, and, plied well with good things, would soon pop off."

He had a wife about fifteen years his junior, but no children; and they entered the neighbourhood with the usual fair report of being very respectable, agreeable people.

The time was now come when Sir Thomas expected his sister-in-law to claim her share in their niece, the change in Mrs Norris's situation, and the improvement in Fanny's age, seeming not merely to do away any former objection to their living together, but even to give it the most decided eligibility; and as his own circumstances were rendered less fair than heretofore, by some recent losses on his West India estate, in addition to his eldest son's extravagance, it became not undesirable to himself to be relieved from the expense of her support, and the obligation of her future provision. In the fulness of his belief that such a thing must be, he mentioned its probability to his wife; and the first time of the subject's occurring to her again, happening to be when Fanny was present, she calmly observed to her, "So, Fanny, you are going to leave us, and live with my sister. How shall you like it?"

[31]

Fanny was too much surprised to do more than repeat her aunt's words, "Going to leave you?"

"Yes, my dear; why should you be astonished? You have been five years with us, and my sister always meant to take you when Mr Norris died. But you must come up and tack on my patterns all the same."

The news was as disagreeable to Fanny as it had been unexpected. She had never received kindness from her aunt Norris, and could not love her.

"I shall be very sorry to go away," said she, with a faltering voice.

"Yes, I dare say you will; that's natural [32] enough. I suppose you have had as little to vex you since you came into this house as any creature in the world."

"I hope I am not ungrateful, aunt," said Fanny, modestly.

"No, my dear; I hope not. I have always found you a very good girl."

"And am I never to live here again?"

"Never, my dear; but you are sure of a comfortable home. It can make very little difference to you, whether you are in one house or the other."

Fanny left the room with a very sorrowful heart: she could not feel the difference to be so small, she could not think of living with her aunt with anything like satisfaction. As soon as she met with Edmund, she told him her distress.

"Cousin," said she, "something is going to happen which I do not like at all; and though you have often persuaded me into being reconciled to things that I disliked at first, you will not be able to do it now. I am going to live entirely with my aunt Norris."

"Indeed!"

"Yes: my aunt Bertram has just told me so. It is quite settled. I am to leave Mansfield Park, and go to the White House, I suppose, as soon as she is removed there."

"Well, Fanny, and if the plan were not unpleasant to you, I should call it an excellent one." "Oh, cousin!"

"It has everything else in its favour. My aunt is acting like a sensible woman in wishing for you. She is choosing a friend and companion exactly where she ought, and I am glad her love of money does not interfere. You will be what you ought to be to her. I hope it does not distress you very much, Fanny?"

"Indeed it does: I cannot like it. I love this house and everything in it: I shall love nothing there. You know how uncomfortable I feel with her."

"I can say nothing for her manner to you as a child; but it was the same with us all, or nearly so. She never knew how to be pleasant to children. But you are now of an age to be treated better; I think she is behaving better already; and when you are her only companion, you must be important to her."

"I can never be important to any one."

"What is to prevent you?"

"Everything. My situation, my foolishness, and awkwardness."

"As to your foolishness and awkwardness, my dear Fanny, believe me, you never have a shadow of either, but in using the words so improperly. There is no reason in the world why you should not be important where you are known. You have good sense, and a sweet temper, and I am sure you have a grateful heart, that could never receive kindness without wishing to return it. I do not know any better qualifications for a friend and companion."

[34]

"You are too kind," said Fanny, colouring at such praise; "how shall I ever thank you as I ought, for thinking so well of me. Oh! cousin, if I am to go away, I shall remember your goodness to the last moment of my life."

"Why, indeed, Fanny, I should hope to be remembered at such a distance as the White House. You speak as if you were going two hundred miles off instead of only across the park; but you will belong to us almost as much as ever. The two families will be meeting every day in the year. The only difference will be, that living with your aunt, you will necessarily be brought forward as you ought to be. Here, there are too many whom you can hide behind; but with her you will be forced to speak for yourself."

"Oh! do not say so."

"I must say it, and say it with pleasure. Mrs Norris is much better fitted than my mother for having the charge of you now. She is of a temper to do a great deal for anybody she really interests herself about, and she will force you to do justice to your natural powers."

Fanny sighed, and said, "I cannot see things as you do; but I ought to believe you to be right rather than myself, and I am very much obliged to you for trying to reconcile me to what must be. If I could suppose my aunt really to care for me, it would be delightful to feel myself of consequence to anybody. Here, I know, I am of none, and yet I love the place so well."

[35]

"The place, Fanny, is what you will not quit, though you quit the house. You will have as free a command of the park and gardens as ever. Even your constant little heart need not take fright at such a nominal change. You will have the same walks to frequent, the same library to choose from, the same people to look at, the same horse to ride."

"Very true. Yes, dear old grey pony! Ah! cousin, when I remember how much I used to dread riding, what terrors it gave me to hear it talked of as likely to do me good (oh! how I have trembled at my uncle's opening his lips if horses were talked of), and then think of the kind pains you took to reason and persuade me out of my fears, and convince me that I should like it after a little while, and feel how right you proved to be, I am inclined to hope you may always prophesy as well."

"And I am quite convinced that your being with Mrs Norris will be as good for your mind as riding has been for your health, and as much for your ultimate happiness, too."

[36]

So ended their discourse, which, for any very appropriate service it could render Fanny, might as well have been spared, for Mrs Norris had not the smallest intention of taking her. It had never occurred to her, on the present occasion, but as a thing to be carefully avoided. To prevent its being expected, she had fixed on the smallest habitation which could rank as genteel among the buildings of Mansfield parish, the White House being only just large enough to receive herself and her servants, and allow a spare room for a friend, of which she made a very particular point. The spare rooms at the Parsonage had never been wanted, but the absolute necessity of a spare room for a friend was now never forgotten. Not all her precautions, however, could save her from being suspected of something better; or, perhaps, her very display of the importance of a spare room might have misled Sir Thomas to suppose it really intended for Fanny. Lady Bertram soon brought the matter to a certainty, by carelessly observing to Mrs Norris-

"I think, sister, we need not keep Miss Lee any longer, when Fanny goes to live with you."

Mrs Norris almost started. "Live with me, dear Lady Bertram! what do you mean?"

"Is she not to live with you? I thought you had settled it with Sir Thomas."

"Me! never. I never spoke a syllable about it to Sir Thomas, nor he to me. Fanny live with me! the last thing in the world for me to think of, or for anybody to wish that really knows us both. Good heaven! what could I do with Fanny? Me! a poor, helpless, forlorn widow, unfit for anything, my spirits quite broke down; what could I do with a girl at her time of life? A girl of fifteen! the very age of all others to need most attention and care, and put the cheerfullest spirits to the test! Sure Sir Thomas could seriously expect such a thing! Sir Thomas is too much my friend. Nobody that wishes me well, I am sure, would propose it. How came Sir Thomas to speak to you about it?"

"Indeed, I do not know. I suppose he thought it best."

"But what did he say? He could not say he wished me to take Fanny. I am sure in his heart he could not wish me to do it."

"No; he only said he thought it very likely; and I thought so too. We both thought it would be a comfort to you. But if you do not like it, there is no more to be said. She is no incumbrance here."

"Dear Sister, if you consider my unhappy state, how can she be any comfort to me? Here am I, a poor desolate widow, deprived of the best of husbands, my health gone in attending and nursing him, my spirits still worse, all my peace in this world destroyed, with hardly enough to support me in the rank of a gentlewoman, and enable me to live so as not to disgrace the memory of the dear departed—what possible comfort could I have in taking such a charge upon me as Fanny? If I could wish it for my own sake, I would not do so unjust a thing by the poor girl. She is in good hands, and sure of doing well. I must struggle through my sorrows and difficulties as I can."

[38]

"Then you will not mind living by yourself quite alone?"

"Dear Lady Bertram, what am I fit for but solitude? Now and then I shall hope to have a friend in my little cottage (I shall always have a bed for a friend); but the most part of my future days will be spent in utter seclusion. If I can but make both ends meet, that's all I ask for."

"I hope, sister, things are not so very bad with you neither, considering Sir Thomas says you will have six hundred a-year."

"Lady Bertram, I do not complain. I know I cannot live as I have done, but I must retrench where I can, and learn to be a better manager. I have been a liberal housekeeper enough, but I shall not be ashamed to practise economy now. My situation is as much altered as my income. A great many things were due from poor Mr Norris, as clergy of the parish, that cannot be expected from me. It is unknown how much was consumed in our kitchen by odd comers and goers. At the White House, matters must be better looked after. I must live within my income, or I shall be miserable; and I own it would give me great satisfaction to be able to do rather more, to lay by a little at the end of the year."

[39]

"I dare say you will. You always do, don't you?"

"My object, Lady Bertram, is to be of use to those that come after me. It is for your children's good that I wish to be richer. I have nobody else to care for; but I should be very glad to think I could leave a little trifle among them worth their having."

"You are very good, but do not trouble yourself about them. They are sure of being well provided for. Sir Thomas will take care of that."

"Why, you know, Sir Thomas's means will be rather straitened if the Antigua estate is to make such poor returns."

"Oh! that will soon be settled. Sir Thomas has been writing about it, I know."

"Well, Lady Bertram," said Mrs Norris, moving to go, "I can only say that my sole desire is to be of use to your family: and so, if Sir Thomas should ever speak again about my taking Fanny, you will be able to say that my health and spirits put it quite out of the question; besides that, I [40] really should not have a bed to give her, for I must keep a spare room for a friend."

Lady Bertram repeated enough of this conversation to her husband to convince him how much he had mistaken his sister-in-law's views; and she was from that moment perfectly safe from all expectation, or the slightest allusion to it from him. He could not but wonder at her refusing to do anything for a niece whom she had been so forward to adopt; but, as she took early care to make him, as well as Lady Bertram, understand that whatever she possessed was designed for their family, he soon grew reconciled to a distinction which, at the same time that it was advantageous and complimentary to them, would enable him better to provide for Fanny himself.

Fanny soon learnt how unnecessary had been her fears of a removal: and her spontaneous, untaught felicity on the discovery, conveyed some consolation to Edmund for his disappointment in what he had expected to be so essentially serviceable to her. Mrs Norris took possession of the White House, the Grants arrived at the Parsonage, and these events over, everything at Mansfield went on for some time as usual.

The Grants showing a disposition to be friendly and sociable, gave great satisfaction in the main among their new acquaintance. They had their faults, and Mrs Norris soon found them out. The Dr. was very fond of eating, and would have a good dinner every day; and Mrs Grant, instead of contriving to gratify him at little expense, gave her cook as high wages as they did at Mansfield Park, and was scarcely ever seen in her offices. Mrs Norris could not speak with any temper of such grievances, nor of the quantity of butter and eggs that were regularly consumed in the house. "Nobody loved plenty and hospitality more than herself; nobody more hated pitiful doings; the Parsonage, she believed, had never been wanting in comforts of any sort, had never borne a bad character in her time, but this was a way of going on that she could not understand. A fine lady in a country parsonage was quite out of place. Her storeroom, she thought, might have been good enough for Mrs Grant to go into. Enquire where she would, she could not find out that Mrs Grant had ever had more than five thousand pounds."

Lady Bertram listened without much interest to this sort of invective. She could not enter into the wrongs of an economist, but she felt all the injuries of beauty in Mrs Grant's being so well settled in life without being handsome, and expressed her astonishment on that point almost as often, though not so diffusely, as Mrs Norris discussed the other.

[42]

These opinions had been hardly canvassed a year before another event arose of such importance in the family, as might fairly claim some place in the thoughts and conversation of the ladies. Sir Thomas found it expedient to go to Antigua himself, for the better arrangement of his affairs, and he took his eldest son with him, in the hope of detaching him from some bad connections at home. They left England with the probability of being nearly a twelvemonth absent.

The necessity of the measure in a pecuniary light, and the hope of its utility to his son, reconciled Sir Thomas to the effort of quitting the rest of his family, and of leaving his daughters to the direction of others at their present most interesting time of life. He could not think Lady Bertram quite equal to supply his place with them, or rather, to perform what should have been her own; but, in Mrs Norris's watchful attention, and in Edmund's judgment, he had sufficient confidence to make him go without fears for their conduct.

Lady Bertram did not at all like to have her husband leave her; but she was not disturbed by any alarm for his safety, or solicitude for his comfort, being one of those persons who think nothing can be dangerous or difficult, or fatiguing, to anybody but themselves.

The Miss Bertrams were much to be pitied on the occasion; not for their sorrow, but for their want of it. Their father was no object of love to them; he had never seemed the friend of their pleasures, and his absence was unhappily most welcome. They were relieved by it from all restraint; and without aiming at one gratification that would probably have been forbidden by Sir Thomas, they felt themselves immediately at their own disposal, and to have every indulgence within their reach. Fanny's relief, and her consciousness of it, were quite equal to her cousins'; but a more tender nature suggested that her feelings were ungrateful, and she really grieved because she could not grieve. "Sir Thomas, who had done so much for her and her brothers, and who was gone perhaps never to return! that she should see him go without a tear! it was a shameful insensibility." He had said to her, moreover, on the very last morning, that he hoped she might see William again in the course of the ensuing winter, and had charged her to write and invite him to Mansfield, as soon as the squadron to which he belonged should be known to be in England. "This was so thoughtful and kind!" and would he only have smiled upon her, and called her "my dear Fanny," while he said it, every former frown or cold address might have been forgotten. But he had ended his speech in a way to sink her in sad mortification, by adding, "If [44]

[43]

William does come to Mansfield, I hope you may be able to convince him that the many years which have passed since you parted have not been spent on your side entirely without improvement; though, I fear, he must find his sister at sixteen in some respects too much like his sister at ten." She cried bitterly over this reflection when her uncle was gone; and her cousins, on seeing her with red eyes, set her down as a hypocrite.

CHAPTER IV

TOM BERTRAM had of late spent so little of his time at home, that he could be only nominally missed; and Lady Bertram was soon astonished to find how very well they did even without his father, how well Edmund could supply his place in carving, talking to the steward, writing to the attorney, settling with the servants, and equally saving her from all possible fatigue or exertion in every particular, but that of directing her letters.

The earliest intelligence of the travellers' safe arrival at Antigua, after a favourable voyage, was received; though not before Mrs Norris had been indulging in very dreadful fears, and trying to make Edmund participate them whenever she could get him alone; and as she depended on being the first person made acquainted with any fatal catastrophe, she had already arranged the manner of breaking it to all the others, when Sir Thomas's assurances of their both being alive and well, made it necessary to lay by her agitation and affectionate preparatory speeches for a while.

The winter came and passed without their being called for; the accounts continued perfectly good; and Mrs Norris, in promoting gaieties for her nieces, assisting their toilets, displaying their accomplishments, and looking about for their future husbands, had so much to do, as in addition to all her own household cares, some interference in those of her sister, and Mrs Grant's wasteful doings to overlook, left her very little occasion to be occupied in fears for the absent.

The Miss Bertrams were now fully established among the belles of the neighbourhood; and as they joined to beauty and brilliant acquirements a manner naturally easy, and carefully formed to general civility and obligingness, they possessed its favour as well as its admiration. Their vanity was in such good order, that they seemed to be quite free from it, and gave themselves no airs; while the praises attending such behaviour, secured and brought round by their aunt, served to strengthen them in believing they had no faults.

Lady Bertram did not go into public with [46]

her daughters. She was too indolent even to accept a mother's gratification in witnessing their success and enjoyment at the expense of any personal trouble, and the charge was made over to her sister, who desired nothing better than a post of such honourable representation, and very thoroughly relished the means it afforded her of mixing in society without having horses to hire.

Fanny had no share in the festivities of the season; but she enjoyed being avowedly useful as her aunt's companion, when they called away the rest of the family; and, as Miss Lee had left Mansfield, she naturally became everything to Lady Bertram during the night of a ball or a party. She talked to her, listened to her, read to her; and the tranquillity of such evenings, her perfect security in such a tête-à-tête from any sound of unkindness, was unspeakably welcome to a mind which had seldom known a pause in its alarms or embarrassments. As to her cousins' gaieties, she loved to hear an account of them, especially of the balls, and whom Edmund had danced with; but thought too lowly of her own situation to imagine she should ever be admitted to the same, and listened, therefore, without an idea of any nearer concern in them. Upon the whole, it was a comfortable winter to her; for though it brought no William to England, the never-failing hope of his arrival was worth much.

The ensuing spring deprived her of her valued friend the old grey pony; and for some time she was in danger of feeling the loss in her health as well as in her affections; for in spite of the acknowledged importance of her riding on horseback, no measures were taken for mounting her again, "because," as it was observed by her aunts, "she might ride one of her cousins' horses at any time when they did not want them," and as the Miss Bertrams regularly wanted their horses every fine day, and had no idea of carrying their obliging manners to the sacrifice of any real pleasure, that time, of course, never came. They took their cheerful rides in the fine mornings of April and May; and Fanny either sat at home the whole day with one aunt, or walked beyond her strength at the instigation of the other; Lady Bertram holding exercise to be as unnecessary for everybody as it was unpleasant to herself; and Mrs Norris, who was walking all day, thinking everybody ought to walk as much. Edmund was absent at this time, or the evil would have been earlier remedied. When he returned, to understand how [Fanny] was situated, and perceived its ill effects, there seemed with him but one thing to be done; and that "Fanny must have a horse," was the resolute declaration with which he opposed whatever could be urged by the supineness of his mother, or the economy of his unt, to make it appear unimportant. Mrs Norris could not help thinking that some steady old thing might be found among the numbers belonging to the Park, that would do vastly well; or, that one might be borrowed of the steward; or that perhaps Dr Grant might now and then lend them the pony he sent to the post. She could not but consider it as absolutely unnecessary, and even improper, that Fanny should have a regular lady's horse of her own, in the style of her cousins. She was sure Sir Thomas had never intended it: and she must say, that to be making such a purchase in his absence, and adding to the great expenses of his stable, at a time when a large part of his income was unsettled, seemed to her very unjustifiable. "Fanny must have a horse," was Edmund's only reply. Mrs Norris could not see it in the same light. Lady Bertram did: she entirely agreed with her son as to the necessity of it, and as to its being considered necessary by his father; she only pleaded against there being any hurry; she only wanted him to wait till Sir Thomas's return, and then Sir Thomas might settle it all himself. He would be at home in September, and where would be the harm of only waiting till September?

[48]

Though Edmund was much more displeased with his aunt than with his mother, as evincing least regard for her niece, he could not help paying more attention to what she said, and at length determined on a method of proceeding which would obviate the risk of his father's thinking he had done too much, and at the same time procure for Fanny the immediate means of exercise, which he could not bear she should be without. He had three horses of his own, but not one that would carry a woman. Two of them were hunters; the third, a useful road-horse: this third he resolved to exchange for one that his cousin might ride; he knew where such a one was to be met with; and having once made up his mind, the whole business was soon completed. The new mare proved a treasure; with a very little trouble. she became exactly calculated for the purpose and Fanny was then put in almost full possession of her. She had not supposed before, that anything could ever suit her like the old grey pony but her delight in Edmund's mare was far beyond any former pleasure of the sort; and the addition it was ever receiving in the consideration of that kindness from which her pleasure sprung was beyond all her words to express. She regarded her cousin as an example of everything good and great, as possessing worth, which no one but herself could ever appreciate, and as entitled to such gratitude from her, as no feeling could be strong enough to pay. Her sentiment towards him were compounded of all that was respectful, grateful, confiding and tender.

[49]

[50]

As the horse continued in name, as well as fact, the property of Edmund, Mrs Norris could tolerate its being for Fanny's use; and had Lady Bertram ever thought about her own objection again, he might have been excused in her eyes for not waiting till Sir Thomas's return in September, for when September came, Sir Thomas was still abroad, and without any near prospect of finishing his business. Unfavourable circumstances had suddenly arisen at a moment when he was beginning to turn all his thoughts towards England; and the very great uncertainty in which everything was then involved determined him on sending home his son, and waiting the final arrangement by himself. Tom arrived safely, bringing an excellent account of his father's health; but to very little purpose, as far as Mrs Norris was concerned. Sir Thomas's sending away his son seemed to her so like a parent's care, under the influence of a foreboding of evil to himself, that she could not help feeling dreadful presentiments; and as the long evenings of autumn came on, was so terribly haunted by these ideas, in the sad solitariness of her cottage, as to be obliged to take daily refuge in the dining-room of the Park. The return of winter engagements, however, was not without its effect; and in the course of their progress, her mind became so pleasantly occupied in superintending the fortunes of her eldest niece, as tolerably to quiet her nerves. "If poor Sir Thomas were fated never to return, it would be peculiarly consoling to see their dear Maria well married," she very often thought; always when they were in the company of men of fortune, and particularly on the introduction of a young man who had recently succeeded to one of the largest estates and finest places in the country.

Mr Rushworth was from the first struck with the beauty of Miss Bertram, and, being inclined to marry, soon fancied himself in love. He was a heavy young man, with not more than common sense; but as there was nothing disagreeable in his figure or address, the young lady was well pleased with her conquest. Being now in her twenty-first year, Maria Bertram was beginning to think matrimony a duty, and as a marriage with Mr Rushworth would give her the enjoyment of a larger income than her father's, as well as ensure her the house in town, which was now a prime object, it became, by the same rule of moral obligation, her evident duty to marry Mr Rushworth if she could. Mrs Norris was most zealous in promoting the match, by every suggestion and contrivance likely to enhance its desirableness to either party; and, among other means, by seeking an intimacy with the gentleman's mother, who at present lived with him, and to [52] hom she even forced Lady Bertram to go rough ten miles of indifferent road to pay a norning visit. It was not long before a good nderstanding took place between this lady and erself. Mrs Rushworth acknowledged herself ery desirous that her son should marry, and delared that of all the young ladies she had ever een, Miss Bertram seemed, by her amiable qualies and accomplishments, the best adapted to ake him happy. Mrs Norris accepted the comliment, and admired the nice discernment of haracter which could so well distinguish merit. Iaria was indeed the pride and delight of them ll-perfectly faultless-an angel; and, of ourse, so surrounded by admirers, must be diffiult in her choice: but yet, as far as Mrs Norris ould allow herself to decide on so short an equaintance, Mr Rushworth appeared precisely ne young man to deserve and attach her.

After dancing with each other at a proper umber of balls, the young people justified these pinions, and an engagement, with a due refernce to the absent Sir Thomas, was entered into, such to the satisfaction of their respective famies, and of the general lookers-on of the neighburhood, who had, for many weeks past, felt the expediency of Mr Rushworth's marrying Miss ertram.

It was some months before Sir Thomas's consent could be received; but, in the meanwhile, a no one felt a doubt of his most cordial pleasur in the connection, the intercourse of the two far ilies was carried on without restraint, and n other attempt made at secrecy, than Mrs Norris' talking of it everywhere as a matter not to b talked of at present.

Edmund was the only one of the family wh could see a fault in the business; but no representation of his aunt's could induce him to find M Rushworth a desirable companion. He coulallow his sister to be the best judge of her owhappiness, but he was not pleased that her hap piness should centre in a large income; nor coulhe refrain from often saying to himself, in M Rushworth's company—"If this man had no twelve thousand a year, he would be a very stupifellow."

Sir Thomas, however, was truly happy in the prospect of an alliance so unquestionably advantageous, and of which he heard nothing but the perfectly good and agreeable. It was a connection exactly of the right sort—in the same county and the same interest—and his most hearty concurrence was conveyed as soon as possible. H only conditioned that the marriage should no take place before his return, which he was again looking eagerly forward to. He wrote in April and had strong hopes of settling everything the [54] his entire satisfaction, and leaving Antigua before the end of the summer.

Such was the state of affairs in the month of July; and Fanny had just reached her eighteenth year, when the society of the village received an addition in the brother and sister of Mrs Grant, a Mr and Miss Crawford, the children of her mother by a second marriage. They were young people of fortune. The son had a good estate in Norfolk, the daughter twenty thousand pounds. As children, their sister had been always very fond of them; but, as her own marriage had been soon followed by the death of their common parent, which left them to the care of a brother of their father, of whom Mrs Grant knew nothing, she had scarcely seen them since. In their uncle's house they had found a kind home. Admiral and Mrs Crawford, though agreeing in nothing else, were united in affection for these children, or, at least, were no farther adverse in their feelings than that each had their favourite, to whom they showed the greatest fondness of the two. The Admiral delighted in the boy, Mrs Crawford doated on the girl; and it was the ady's death which now obliged her protégée, after some months' further trial at her uncle's nouse, to find another home. Admiral Crawford vas a man of vicious conduct, who chose, instead of retaining his niece, to bring his mistress under his own roof; and to this Mrs Grant was indebted for her sister's proposal of coming to her, a meas ure quite as welcome on one side as it could b expedient on the other; for Mrs Grant, having by this time run through the usual resources of ladies residing in the country without a family of children-having more than filled he favourite sitting-room with pretty furniture, and made a choice collection of plants and poultrywas very much in want of some variety at home The arrival, therefore, of a sister whom she had always loved, and now hoped to retain with her as long as she remained single, was highly agree able; and her chief anxiety was, lest Mansfield should not satisfy the habits of a young woman who had been mostly used to London.

[55]

ENTENADY TIMOR COLLEGE

Miss Crawford was not entirely free from similar apprehensions, though they arose principally from doubts of her sister's style of living and tone of society; and it was not till after she had tried in vain to persuade her brother to settle with her at his own country-house, that she could resolve to hazard herself among her other relations. To anything like a permanence of abode, or limitation of society, Henry Crawford had, unluckily, a great dislike; he could not accommodate his sister in an article of such importance; but he escorted her, with the utmost kindness, into Northamptonshire, and as readily engaged to fetch her away again, at half an hour's notice, whenever she were weary of the place.

[56]

Sir Thomas brought him to her, saying that she was to lead the way and open the ball

The meeting was very satisfactory on each side. Miss Crawford found a sister without preciseness or rusticity—a sister's husband who looked the gentleman, and a house commodious and well fitted up; and Mrs Grant received in those whom she hoped to love better than ever, a young man and woman of very prepossessing appearance. Mary Crawford was remarkably pretty; Henry, though not handsome, had air and countenance; the manners of both were lively and pleasant, and Mrs Grant immediately gave them credit for everything else. She was delighted with each, but Mary was her dearest object; and naving never been able to glory in beauty of her own, she thoroughly enjoyed the power of being proud of her sister's. She had not waited her arrival to look out for a suitable match for her; he had fixed on Tom Bertram; the eldest son of a baronet was not too good for a girl of twenty housand pounds, with all the elegance and accomplishments which Mrs Grant foresaw in her; nd being a warm-hearted, unreserved woman, Mary had not been three hours in the house efore she told her what she had planned.

Miss Crawford was glad to find a family of uch consequence so very near them, and not at ll displeased either at her sister's early care, or the choice it had fallen on. Matrimony was her object, provided she could marry well: and having seen Mr Bertram in town, she knew that objection could no more be made to his person than to his situation in life. While she treated it as a joke, therefore, she did not forget to think of it seriously. The scheme was soon repeated to Henry.

"And now," added Mrs Grant, "I have thought of something to make it complete. I should dearly love to settle you both in this country; and therefore, Henry, you shall marry the youngest Miss Bertram, a nice, handsome, good-humoured, accomplished girl, who will make you very happy."

Henry bowed and thanked her.

"My dear sister," said Mary, "if you can persuade him into anything of the sort, it will be a fresh matter of delight to me to find myself allied to anybody so clever, and I shall only regret that you have not half-a-dozen daughters to dispose of. If you can persuade Henry to marry, you must have the address of a Frenchwoman. All that English abilities can do has been tried already. I have three very particular friends who have been all dying for him in their turn; and the pains which they, their mothers (very clever women), as well as my dear aunt and myself, have taken to reason, coax, or trick him into marying, is inconceivable! He is the most horrible lirt that can be imagined. If your Miss Berrams do not like to have their hearts broke, let hem avoid Henry."

[58]

"My dear brother, I will not believe this of you."

"No, I am sure you are too good. You will be kinder than Mary. You will allow for the loubts of youth and inexperience. I am of a sautious temper, and unwilling to risk my happiness in a hurry. Nobody can think more highly of the matrimonial state than myself. I consider he blessing of a wife as most justly described in hose discreet lines of the poet 'Heaven's last best gift."

"There, Mrs Grant, you see how he dwells on one word, and only look at his smile. I assure you he is very detestable; the Admiral's lessons have quite spoiled him."

"I pay very little regard," said Mrs Grant, "to what any young person says on the subject of marriage. If they profess a disinclination for t, I only set it down that they have not yet seen he right person."

Dr Grant laughingly congratulated Miss Crawford on feeling no disinclination to the state erself.

"Oh yes! I am not at all ashamed of it. I rould have everybody marry if they can do it properly: I do not like to have people throw themselves away: but everybody should marry as soon as they can do it to advantage."

CHAPTER V

THE young people were pleased with each other from the first. On each side there was much to attract, and their acquaintance soon promised as early an intimacy as good manners would warrant. Miss Crawford's beauty did her no disservice with the Miss Bert-They were too handsome themselves to rams. dislike any woman for being so too, and were almost as much charmed as their brothers with her lively dark eye, clear brown complexion, and general prettiness. Had she been tall, full formed, and fair, it might have been more of a trial; but as it was, there could be no comparison; and she was most allowably a sweet pretty girl, while they were the finest young women in the country.

Her brother was not handsome; no, when they first saw him he was absolutely plain, black and plain; but still he was the gentleman, with a pleasing address. The second meeting proved him not so very plain; he was plain, to be sure, but then he had so much countenance, and his teeth were so good, and he was so well made, that one soon forgot he was plain; and after a third interview, after dining in company with him at the Parsonage, he was no longer allowed to be called so by anybody. He was, in fact, the most agreeable young man the sisters had ever known, and they were equally delighted with him. Miss Bertram's engagement made him in equity the property of Julia, of which Julia was fully aware; and before he had been at Mansfield a week, she was quite ready to be fallen in love with.

[60]

Maria's notions on the subject were more confused and indistinct. She did not want to see or understand. "There could be no harm in her liking an agreeable man—everybody knew her situation—Mr Crawford must take care of himself." Mr Crawford did not mean to be in any danger! the Miss Bertrams were worth pleasing, and were ready to be pleased; and he began with no object but of making them like him. He did not want them to die of love; but with sense and temper which ought to have made him judge and feel better, he allowed himself great latitude on such points.

"I like your Miss Bertrams exceedingly, sister," said he, as he returned from attending them to their carriage after the said dinner visit; "they are very elegant, agreeable girls."

"So they are, indeed, and I am delighted to hear you say it. But you like Julia best."

"Oh yes! I like Julia best."

"But do you really? for Miss Bertram is in general thought the handsomest."

"So I should suppose. She has the advantage in every feature, and I prefer her countenance; but I like Julia best; Miss Bertram is certainly the handsomest, and I have found her the most agreeable, but I shall always like Julia best, because you order me."

"I shall not talk to you, Henry, but I know you will like her best at last."

"Do not I tell you that I like her best at first?"

"And besides, Miss Bertram is engaged. Remember that, my dear brother. Her choice is made."

"Yes, and I like her the better for it. An engaged woman is always more agreeable than a disengaged. She is satisfied with herself. Her cares are over, and she feels that she may exert all her powers of pleasing without suspicion. All is safe with a lady engaged; no harm can be done."

"Why, as to that, Mr Rushworth is a very good sort of young man, and it is a great match for her."

"But Miss Bertram does not care three straws for him; that is your opinion of your intimate [62] friend. I do not subscribe to it. I am sure Miss Bertram is very much attached to Mr Rushworth. I could see it in her eyes, when he was mentioned. I think too well of Miss Bertram to suppose she would ever give her hand without her heart."

"Mary, how shall we manage him?"

"We must leave him to himself, I believe. Talking does no good. He will be taken in at last."

"But I would not have him taken in; I would not have him duped; I would have it all fair and honourable."

"Oh dear! let him stand his chance and be taken in. It will do just as well. Everybody is taken in at some period or other."

"Not always in marriage, dear Mary."

"In marriage especially. With all due respect to such of the present company as chance to be married, my dear Mrs Grant, there is not one in a hundred of either sex who is not taken in when they marry. Look where I will, I see that it is so; and I feel that it must be so, when I consider that it is, of all transactions, the one in which people expect most from others, and are least honest themselves."

"Ah! You have been in a bad school for matrimony, in Hill-street."

"My poor aunt had certainly little cause to love the state; but, however, speaking from my own observation, it is a manœuvring business. I know so many who have married in the full expectation and confidence of some one particular advantage in the connection, or accomplishment, or good quality in the person, who have found themselves entirely deceived, and been obliged to put up with exactly the "everse. What is this but a take in?"

[63]

"My dear child, there must be a little imagination here. I beg your pardon, but I cannot quite believe you. Depend upon it, you see but half. You see the evil, but you do not see the consolation. There will be little rubs and disappointments everywhere, and we are all apt to expect too much; but then, if one scheme of happiness fails, human nature turns to another; if the first calculation is wrong, we make a second better; we find comfort somewhere—and those evilminded observers, dearest Mary, who make much of a little, are more taken in and deceived than the parties themselves."

"Well done, sister! I honour your esprit du corps. When I am a wife, I mean to be just as staunch myself; and I wish my friends in general would be so too. It would save me many a heart-ache."

"You are as bad as your brother, Mary; but we will cure you both. Mansfield shall cure you both, and without any taking in. Stay with us, and we will cure you."

[64]

The Crawfords, without wanting to be cured, were very willing to stay. Mary was satisfied with the Parsonage as a present home, and Henry equally ready to lengthen his visit. He had come, intending to spend only a few days with them; but Mansfield promised well, and there was nothing to call him elsewhere. It delighted Mrs Grant to keep them both with her, and Dr Grant was exceedingly well contented to have it so: a talking pretty young woman like Miss Crawford is always pleasant society to an indolent, stay-athome man; and Mr Crawford's being his guest was an excuse for drinking claret every day.

The Miss Bertrams' admiration of Mr Crawford was more rapturous than anything which Miss Crawford's habits made her likely to feel. She acknowledged, however, that the Mr Bertrams were very fine young men, that two such young men were not often seen together even in London, and that their manners, particularly those of the eldest, were very good. He had been much in London, and had more liveliness and gallantry than Edmund, and must, therefore, be preferred; and, indeed, his being the eldest was another strong claim. She had felt an early presentiment that she should like the eldest best. She knew it was her way.

Tom Bertram must have been thought pleasant, indeed, at any rate; he was the sort of young man to be generally liked, his agreeableness was of the kind to be oftener found agreeable than some endowments of a higher stamp, for he had easy manners, excellent spirits, a large acquaintance, and a great deal to say; and the reversion of Mansfield Park, and a baronetcy, did no harm to all this. Miss Crawford soon felt that he and his situation might do. She looked about her with due consideration, and found almost everything in his favour, a park, a real park, five miles round, a spacious modern-built house, so well placed and well screened as to deserve to be in any collection of engravings of gentlemen's seats in the kingdom, and wanting only to be completely new furnished-pleasant sisters, a quiet mother, and an agreeable man himself-with the advantage of being tied up from much gaming at present, by a promise to his father, and of being Sir Thomas hereafter. It might do very well; she believed she should accept him; and she began accordingly to interest herself a little about the horse which he had to run at the B---- races.

[65]

These races were to call him away not long after their acquaintance began; and as it appeared that the family did not, from his usual goings on, expect him back again for many weeks, it would bring his passion to an early proof. Much was said on his side to induce her to attend the races, and schemes were made for a large party to them, with all the eagerness of inclination, but it would only do to be talked of.

And Fanny, what was she doing and thinking all this while? and what was her opinion of the newcomers? Few young ladies of eighteen could be less called on to speak their opinion than Fanny. In a quiet way, very little attended to, she paid her tribute of admiration to Miss Crawford's beauty; but as she still continued to think Mr Crawford very plain, in spite of her two cousins having repeatedly proved the contrary, she never mentioned him. The notice which she excited herself, was to this effect. "I begin now to understand you all, except Miss Price," said Miss Crawford, as she was walking with the Mr Bertrams. "Pray, is she out, or is she not? I am puzzled. She dined at the Parsonage, with the rest of you, which seemed like being out; and yet she says so little, that I can hardly suppose she is."

Edmund, to whom this was chiefly addressed, replied, "I believe I know what you mean, but I will not undertake to answer the question. My cousin is grown up. She has the age and sense of a woman, but the outs and not outs are beyond me."

"And yet, in general, nothing can be more easily ascertained. The distinction is so broad. Manners as well as appearance are, generally speaking, so totally different. Till now, I could not have supposed it possible to be mistaken as to a girl's being out or not. A girl not out, has always the same sort of dress: a close bonnet, for instance; looks very demure, and never says a word. You may smile, but it is so, I assure you: and except that it is sometimes carried a little too far, it is all very proper. Girls should be quiet and modest. The most objectionable part is, that the alteration of manners on being introduced into company is frequently too sudden. They sometimes pass in such very little time from reserve to quite the opposite-to confidence! That is the faulty part of the present system. One does not like to see a girl of eighteen or nineteen so immediately up to everything-and perhaps when one has seen her hardly able to speak the year before. Mr Bertram, I dare say you have sometimes met with such changes."

[67]

"I believe I have, but this is hardly fair; I see what you are at. You are quizzing me and Miss Anderson."

"No, indeed. Miss Anderson! I do not know who or what you mean. I am quite in the dark. But I will quiz you with a great deal of pleasure, if you will tell me what about."

"Ah! you carry it off very well, but I cannot be quite so far imposed on. You must have had Miss Anderson in your eye, in describing an altered young lady. You paint too accurately for mistake. It was exactly so. The Andersons of Baker Street. We were speaking of them the other day, you know. Edmund, you have heard me mention Charles Anderson. The circumstance was precisely as this lady has represented it. When Anderson first introduced me to his family, about two years ago, his sister was not out, and I could not get her to speak to me. I sat there an hour one morning waiting for Anderson, with only her and a little girl or two in the room, the governess being sick or run away, and the mother in and out every moment with letters of business, and I could hardly get a word or a look from the young lady-nothing like a civil answer-she screwed up her mouth, and turned from me with such an air! I did not see her again for a twelvemonth. She was then out. I met her at Mrs Holford's, and did not recollect her. She came up to me, claimed me as an acquaintance, stared me out of countenance, and talked and laughed till I did not know which way to look. I felt that I must be the jest of the room at the time, and Miss Crawford, it is plain, has heard the story."

[68]

٩.

"And a very pretty story it is, and with more truth in it, I dare say, than does credit to Miss Anderson. It is too common a fault. Mothers certainly have not yet got quite the right way of managing their daughters. I do not know where the error lies. I do not pretend to set people right, but I do see that they are often wrong."

[69]

"Those who are showing the world what female manners should be," said Mr Bertram gallantly, "are doing a great deal to set them right."

"The error is plain enough," said the less courteous Edmund; "such girls are ill brought up. They are given wrong notions from the beginning. They are always acting upon motives of vanity, and there is no more real modesty in their behaviour before they appear in public than afterwards."

"I do not know," replied Miss Crawford, hesitatingly. "Yes, I cannot agree with you there. It is certainly the modestest part of the business. It is much worse to have girls not out, give themselves the same airs and take the same liberties as if they were, which I have seen done. That is worse than anything—quite disgusting!"

"Yes, that is very inconvenient, indeed," said Mr Bertram. "It leads one astray; one does not know what to do. The close bonnet and demure air you describe so well (and nothing was ever juster), tell one what is expected; but I got into a dreadful scrape last year from the want of them. I went down to Ramsgate for a week with a friend last September, just after my return from the West Indies. My friend Sneyd—you nave heard me speak of Sneyd, Edmund-his ather, and mother, and sisters, were there, all new to me. When we reached Albion Place, hey were out; we went after them, and found hem on the pier: Mrs and the two Miss Sneyds, with others of their acquaintance. I made my bow in form; and as Mrs Sneyd was surrounded by men, attached myself to one of her daughters, walked by her side all the way home, and made myself as agreeable as I could; the young lady, perfectly easy in her manners, and as ready to talk as to listen. I had not a suspicion that I could be doing anything wrong. They looked just the same: both well dressed, with veils and parasols like other girls; but I afterwards found that I had been giving all my attention to the youngest, who was not out, and had most excessively offended the eldest. Miss Augusta ought not to have been noticed for the next six months; and Miss Sneyd, I believe, has never forgiven me."

[70]

"That was bad, indeed. Poor Miss Sneyd! Though I have no younger sister, I feel for her. To be neglected before one's time must be very vexatious; but it was entirely the mother's fault. Miss Augusta should have been with her governess. Such half and half doings never prosper. But now I must be satisfied about Miss Price. Does she go to balls? Does she dine out everywhere, as well as at my sister's?" "No," replied Edmund; "I do not think she has ever been to a ball. My mother seldom goes into company herself, and dines nowhere but with Mrs Grant, and Fanny stays at home with her."

"Oh! then the point is clear. Miss Price is not out."

CHAPTER VI

R BERTRAM set off for ——, and Miss Crawford was prepared to find a great chasm in their society, and to miss him decidedly in the meetings which were now becoming almost daily between the families; and on their all dining together at the Park soon after his going, she retook her chosen place near the bottom of the table, fully expecting to feel a most melancholy difference in the change of mas-It would be a very flat business, she was ters. sure. In comparison with his brother, Edmund would have nothing to say. The soup would be sent round in a most spiritless manner, wine drank without any smiles or agreeable triffing, and the venison cut up without supplying one pleasant anecdote of any former haunch, or a single entertaining story, about "my friend such a one." She must try to find amusement in what vas passing at the upper end of the table, and in bserving Mr Rushworth, who was now making is appearance at Mansfield for the first time ince the Crawfords' arrival. He had been visitng a friend in the neighbouring county, and that riend having recently had his grounds laid out by an improver, Mr Rushworth was returned with his head full of the subject, and very eager to be improving his own place in the same way; and though not saying much to the purpose, could talk of nothing else. The subject had been already handled in the drawing-room; it was evived in the dining-parlour. Miss Bertram's attention and opinion was evidently his chief aim; and though her deportment showed rather concious superiority than any solicitude to oblige nim, the mention of Sotherton Court, and the deas attached to it, gave her a feeling of complacency, which prevented her from being very ingracious.

[72]

"I wish you could see Compton," said he, "it is the most complete thing! I never saw a place so altered in my life. I told Smith I did not know where I was. The approach, now, is one of the finest things in the country: you see the house in the most surprising manner. I declare, when I got back to Sotherton yesterday, it looked like a porison—quite a dismal old prison."

"Oh, for shame!" cried Mrs Norris. "A prison, indeed? Sotherton Court is the noblest old place in the world."

[73]

"It wants improvement, ma'am, beyond any thing. I never saw a place that wanted so much improvement in my life: and it is so forlorn, that I do not know what can be done with it."

"No wonder that Mr Rushworth should think so at present," said Mrs Grant to Mrs Norris with a smile; "but depend upon it, Sotherton will have every improvement in time which his heart can desire."

"I must try to do something with it," said Mr Rushworth, "but I do not know what. I hope I shall have some good friend to help me."

"Your best friend upon such an occasion," said Miss Bertram calmly, "would be Mr Repton, I imagine."

"That is what I was thinking of. As he has done so well by Smith, I think I had better have him at once. His terms are five guineas a day."

"Well, and if they were ten," cried Mrs Norris, "I am sure you need not regard it. The expense need not be any impediment. If I were you, I should not think of the expense. I would have everything done in the best style, and made as nice as possible. Such a place as Sotherton Court deserves everything that taste and money can do. You have space to work upon there, and grounds that will well reward you. For my own part, if I had anything within the fiftieth part of the size of Sotherton, I should be always planting and improving, for, naturally, I am excessively fond of it. It would be too ridiculous for me to attempt anything where I am now, with my little half acre. It would be quite a burlesque. But if I had more room, I should take a prodigious delight in improving and planting. We did a vast deal in that way at the Parsonage: we made it quite a different place from what it was when we first had it. You young ones do not remember much about it, perhaps; but if dear Sir Thomas were here, he could tell you what improvements we made: and a great deal more would have been done, but for poor Mr Norris's sad state of health. He could hardly ever get out, poor man, to enjoy anything, and that disheartened me from doing several things that Sir Thomas and I used to talk of. If it had not been for that, we should have carried on the garden wall, and made the plantation to shut out the church-yard, just as Dr Grant has done. We were always doing something as it was. It was only the spring twelvemonth before Mr Norris's death, that we put in the apricot against the stable wall, which is now grown such a noble tree, and getting to such perfection, sir," addressing herself then to Dr Grant.

[74]

"The tree thrives well, beyond a doubt, madam," replied Dr Grant. "The soil is good; and I never pass it without regretting that the fruit should be so little worth the trouble of gathering."

[75]

"Sir, it is a Moor-park, we bought it as a Moorpark, and it cost us—that is, it was a present from Sir Thomas, but I saw the bill—and I know it cost seven shillings, and was charged as a Moorpark."

"You were imposed on, ma'am," replied Dr Grant: "these potatoes have as much the flavour of a Moor-park apricot as the fruit from that tree. It is an insipid fruit at the best; but a good apricot is eatable, which none from my garden are."

"The truth is, ma'am," said Mrs Grant, pretending to whisper across the table to Mrs Norris, "that Dr Grant hardly knows what the natural taste of our apricot is: he is scarcely ever indulged with one, for it is so valuable a fruit, with a little assistance, and ours is such a remarkably large, fair sort, that what with early tarts and preserves, my cook contrives to get them all."

Mrs Norris, who had begun to redden, was appeased; and, for a little while, other subjects took place of the improvements of Sotherton. Dr Grant and Mrs Norris were seldom good friends; their acquaintance had begun in dilapidations, and their habits were totally dissimilar.

[76]

After a short interruption, Mr Rushworth began again. "Smith's place is the admiration of all the country; and it was a mere nothing before Repton took it in hand. I think I shall have Repton."

"Mr Rushworth," said Lady Bertram, "if I were you, I would have a very pretty shrubbery. One likes to get out into a shrubbery in fine weather."

Mr Rushworth was eager to assure her ladyship of his acquiescence, and tried to make out something complimentary; but, between his submission to her taste, and his having always intended the same himself, with the superadded objects of professing attention to the comfort of ladies in general, and of insinuating that there was one only whom he was anxious to please, he grew puzzled, and Edmund was glad to put an end to his speech by a proposal of wine. Mr Rushworth, however, though not usually a great talker, had still more to say on the subject next his heart. "Smith has not much above a hundred acres altogether, in his grounds, which is little enough, and makes it more surprising that the place can have been so improved. Now, at Sotherton, we have a good seven hundred, without reckoning the water meadows; so that I think, if so much could be done at Compton, we need not despair. There have been two or three fine old trees cut down, that grew too near the house, and it opens the prospect amazingly, which makes me think that Repton, or anybody of that sort, would certainly have the avenue at Sotherton down; the avenue that leads from the west front to the top of the hill, you know," turning to Miss Bertram particularly as he spoke. But Miss Bertram thought it most becoming to reply—

[77]

"The avenue! Oh! I do not recollect it. I really know very little of Sotherton."

Fanny, who was sitting on the other side of Edmund, exactly opposite Miss Crawford, and who had been attentively listening, now looked at him, and said, in a low voice—

"Cut down an avenue! What a pity! Does it not make you think of Cowper? 'Ye fallen avenues, once more I mourn your fate unmerited.'"

He smiled as he answered, "I am afraid the avenue stands a bad chance, Fanny."

"I should like to see Sotherton before it is cut down, to see the place as it is now, in its old state; but I do not suppose I shall."

"Have you never been there? No, you never can; and, unluckily, it is out of distance for a ride. I wish we could contrive it."

"Oh! it does not signify. Whenever I do see it, you will tell me how it has been altered."

"I collect," said Miss Crawford, "that Sother-[78] ton is an old place, and a place of some grandeur. In any particular style of building?"

"The house was built in Elizabeth's time, and is a large, regular, brick building; heavy, but respectable looking, and has many good rooms. It is ill placed. It stands in one of the lowest spots of the park; in that respect, unfavourable for improvement. But the woods are fine, and there is a stream, which, I dare say, might be made a good deal of. Mr Rushworth is quite right, I think, in meaning to give it a modern dress, and I have no doubt that it will be all done extremely well."

Miss Crawford listened with submission, and said to herself, "He is a well-bred man; he makes the best of it."

"I do not wish to influence Mr Rushworth," he continued; "but, had I a place to new-fashion, I should not put myself into the hands of an improver. I would rather have an inferior degree of beauty, of my own choice, and acquired progressively. I would rather abide by my own blunders, than by his."

"You would know what you were about, of course; but that would not suit me. I have no eye or ingenuity for such matters, but as they are before me; and had I a place of my own in the country, I should be most thankful to any Mr Repton who would undertake it, and give me as much beauty as he could for my money; and I should never look at it till it was complete."

[79]

"It would be delightful to me to see the progress of it all," said Fanny.

"Ay, you have been brought up to it. It was no part of my education; and the only dose I ever had, being administered by not the first favourite in the world, has made me consider improvements in hand as the greatest of nuisances. Three years ago, the Admiral, my honoured uncle, bought a cottage at Twickenham for us all to spend our summers in; and my aunt and I went down to it quite in raptures; but it being excessively pretty, it was soon found necessary to be improved, and for three months we were all dirt and confusion, without a gravel walk to step on, or a bench fit for use. I would have everything as complete as possible in the country, shrubberies and flower-gardens, and rustic seats innumerable: but it must all be done without my care. Henry is different, he loves to be doing."

Edmund was sorry to hear Miss Crawford, whom he was much disposed to admire, speak so freely of her uncle. It did not suit his sense of propriety, and he was silenced, till induced by further smiles and liveliness, to put the matter by for the present.

"Mr Bertram," said she, "I have tidings of my harp at last. I am assured that it is safe at [80] Northampton; and there it has probably been these ten days, in spite of the solemn assurances we have so often received to the contrary." Edmund expressed his pleasure and surprise. "The truth is, that our inquiries were too direct; we sent a servant, we went ourselves: this will not do seventy miles from London; but this morning we heard of it in the right way. It was seen by some farmer, and he told the miller, and the miller told the butcher, and the butcher's son-inlaw left word at the shop."

"I am very glad that you have heard of it, by whatever means, and hope there will be no farther delay."

"I am to have it to-morrow; but, how do you think it is to be conveyed? Not by a waggon or cart: oh no! nothing of that kind could be hired in the village. I might as well have asked for porters and a hand-barrow."

"You would find it difficult, I dare say, just now, in the middle of a very late hay harvest, to hire a horse and cart."

"I was astonished to find what a piece of work was made of it! To want a horse and cart in the country seemed impossible, so I told my maid to speak for one directly; and as I cannot look out of my dressing-closet without seeing one farmyard, nor walk in the shrubbery without passing another, I thought it would be only ask and have, and was rather grieved that I could not give the advantage to all. Guess my surprise, when I found that I had been asking the most unreasonable, most impossible thing in the world; had offended all the farmers, all the labourers, all the hay in the parish! As for Dr Grant's bailiff, I believe I had better keep out of his way; and my brother-in-law himself, who is all kindness in general, looked rather black upon me, when he found what I had been at."

[81]

"You could not be expected to have thought on the subject before; but when you do think of it, you must see the importance of getting in the grass. The hire of a cart at any time might not be so easy as you suppose; our farmers are not in the habit of letting them out: but, in harvest, it must be quite out of their power to spare a horse."

"I shall understand all your ways in time; but, coming down with the true London maxim, that everything is to be got with money, I was a little embarrassed at first by the sturdy independence of your country customs. However, I am to have my harp fetched to-morrow. Henry, who is good nature itself, has offered to fetch it in his barouche. Will it not be honourably conveyed?"

Edmund spoke of the harp as his favourite instrument, and hoped to be soon allowed to hear her. Fanny had never heard the harp at all, and wished for it very much.

[82]

"I shall be most happy to play to you both," said Miss Crawford; "at least as long as you can like to listen: probably much longer, for I dearly love music myself, and where the natural taste is equal the player must always be best off, for she is gratified in more ways than one. Now, Mr Bertram, if you write to your brother, I entreat you to tell him that my harp is come; he heard so much of my misery about it. And you may say, if you please, that I shall prepare my most plaintive airs against his return, in compassion to his feelings, as I know his horse will lose."

"If I write, I will say whatever you wish me; but I do not, at present, foresee any occasion for writing."

"No, I dare say, nor if he were to be gone a twelvemonth, would you ever write to him, nor he to you, if it could be helped. The occasion would never be foreseen. What strange creatures prothers are! You would not write to each other out upon the most urgent necessity in the world; and when obliged to take up the pen to say that such a horse is ill, or such a relation dead, it is lone in the fewest possible words. You have but one style among you. I know it perfectly. Henry, who is in every respect exactly what a prother should be, who loves me, consults me, confides in me, and will talk to me by the hour together, has never yet turned the page in a letter; and very often it is nothing more than— 'Dear Mary, I am just arrived. Bath seems full, and everything as usual. Yours sincerely.' That is the true manly style; that is a complete brother's letter."

"When they are at a distance from all their family," said Fanny, colouring for William's sake, "they can write long letters."

"Miss Price has a brother at sea," said Edmund, "whose excellence as a correspondent makes her think you too severe upon us."

"At sea, has she? In the king's service, of course?"

Fanny would rather have had Edmund tell the story, but his determined silence obliged her to relate her brother's situation; her voice was animated in speaking of his profession, and the foreign stations he had been on; but she could not mention the number of years that he had been absent without tears in her eyes. Miss Crawford civilly wished him an early promotion.

"Do you know anything of my cousin's captain?" said Edmund; "Captain Marshall? You have a large acquaintance in the navy, I conclude?"

"Among admirals, large enough; but," with an air of grandeur, "we know very little of the inferior ranks. Post-captains may be very good sort of men, but they do not belong to us. Of various admirals I could tell you a great deal; of them and their flags, and the gradation of their pay, and their bickerings and jealousies. But, in general, I can assure you that they are all passed over, and all very ill used. Certainly, my home at my uncle's brought me acquainted with a circle of admirals. Of Rears and Vices, I saw enough. Now do not be suspecting me of a pun, I entreat."

[84]

Edmund again felt grave, and only replied, 'It is a noble profession."

"Yes, the profession is well enough under two pircumstances; if it make the fortune, and there be discretion in spending it; but, in short, it is not a favourite profession of mine. It has never worn an amiable form to me."

Edmund reverted to the harp, and was again very happy in the prospect of hearing her play.

The subject of improving grounds, meanwhile, was still under consideration among the others; and Mrs Grant could not help addressing her prother, though it was calling his attention from Miss Julia Bertram.

"My dear Henry, have you nothing to say? You have been an improver yourself, and from what I hear of Everingham, it may vie with any place in England. Its natural beauties, I am ure, are great. Everingham, as it used to be, was perfect in my estimation; such a happy fal of ground, and such timber! What would I no give to see it again."

[85]

"Nothing could be so gratifying to me as to hear your opinion of it," was his answer; "but I fear there would be some disappointment: you would not find it equal to your present ideas. In extent, it is a mere nothing; you would be surprised at its insignificance; and, as for improvement, there was very little for me to do—too little; I should like to have been busy much longer."

"You are fond of the sort of thing?" said Julia

"Excessively; but what with the natural advantages of the ground, which pointed out, even to a very young eye, what little remained to be done, and my own consequent resolutions, I had not been of age three months before Everingham was all that it is now. My plan was laid at Westminster, a little altered, perhaps, at Cambridge, and at one-and-twenty executed. I am inclined to envy Mr Rushworth for having so much happiness yet before him. I have been a devourer of my own."

"Those who see quickly, will resolve quickly, and act quickly," said Julia. "You can never want employment. Instead of envying Mr Rushworth, you should assist him with your opinion."

[.86]

Mrs Grant, hearing the latter part of this speech, enforced it warmly; persuaded that no judgment could be equal to her brother's; and as Miss Bertram caught at the idea likewise, and gave it her full support, declaring that, in her opinion, it was infinitely better to consult with friends and disinterested advisers, than immediately to throw the business into the hands of a professional man, Mr Rushworth was very ready to request the favour of Mr Crawford's assistance; and Mr Crawford, after properly depreciating his own abilities, was quite at his service in any way that could be useful. Mr Rushworth then began to propose Mr Crawford's doing him the honour of coming over to Sotherton, and takng a bed there; when Mrs Norris, as if reading n her two nieces' minds their little approbation of a plan which was to take Crawford away, nterposed with an amendment.

"There can be no doubt of Mr Crawford's willngness; but why should not more of us go? Why should not we make a little party? Here are many that would be interested in your improvements, my dear Mr Rushworth, and that would like to hear Mr Crawford's opinion on the spot, and that might be of some small use to you with their opinions; and for my own part, I have been long wishing to wait upon your good mother again; nothing but having no horses of my own could have made me so remiss; but now I could go and sit a few hours with Mrs Rushworth while the rest of you walked about and settled things, and then we could all return to a late dimner here, or dine at Sotherton, just as might be most agreeable to your mother, and have a pleas ant drive home by moonlight. I dare say Mr Crawford would take my two nieces and me in his barouche, and Edmund can go on horseback you know, sister, and Fanny will stay at home with you."

Lady Bertram made no objection; and every one concerned in the going was forward in expressing their ready concurrence, excepting Edmund, who heard it all and said nothing.

CHAPTER VII

"W ELL, Fanny, and how do you like Miss Crawford now?" said Edmund the next day, after thinking some time on the subject himself. "How did you like her yesterday?"

"Very well—very much. I like to hear her talk. She entertains me; and she is so extremely pretty, that I have great pleasure in looking at her."

"It is her countenance that is so attractive. She has a wonderful play of feature! But was here nothing in her conversation that struck you, Fanny, as not quite right?"

"Oh, yes! she ought not to have spoken of her incle as she did. I was quite astonished. An incle with whom she has been living so many years, and who, whatever his faults may be, is so very fond of her brother, treating him, they say, quite like a son. I could not have believed it!"

"I thought you would be struck. It was very wrong; very indecorous."

"And very ungrateful, I think."

"Ungrateful is a strong word. I do not know that her uncle has any claim to her gratitude; his wife certainly had; and it is the warmth of her respect for her aunt's memory which misleads her here. She is awkwardly circumstanced. With such warm feelings and lively spirits it must be lifficult to do justice to her affection for Mrs Crawford, without throwing a shade on the Admiral. I do not pretend to know which was nost to blame in their disagreements, though the Admiral's present conduct might incline one to he side of his wife; but it is natural and amiable hat Miss Crawford should acquit her aunt enirely. I do not censure her opinions: but there ertainly is impropriety in making them public."

"Do not you think," said Fanny, after a little consideration, "that this impropriety is a reflect tion itself upon Mrs Crawford, as her niece ha been entirely brought up by her? She canno have given her right notions of what was due to the Admiral."

[89]

"That is a fair remark. Yes, we must suppose the faults of the niece to have been those of the aunt; and it makes one more sensible of the disadvantages she has been under. But I think her present home must do her good. Mrs Grant's manners are just what they ought to be. She speaks of her brother with a very pleasing affection."

"Yes, except as to his writing her such short letters. She made me almost laugh; but I cannot rate so very highly the love or good nature of a brother, who will not give himself the trouble of writing anything worth reading to his sisters, when they are separated. I am sure William would never have used me so, under any circumstances. And what right had she to suppose that you would not write long letters when you were absent?"

"The right of a lively mind, Fanny, seizing whatever may contribute to its own amusement or that of others; perfectly allowable, when untinctured by ill humour or roughness; and there is not a shadow of either in the countenance or manner of Miss Crawford: nothing sharp, or loud, or coarse. She is perfectly feminine, except in the instances we have been speaking of. There she cannot be justified. I am glad you saw it all as I did."

[90]

Having formed her mind and gained her affections, he had a good chance of her thinking like him: though at this period, and on this subject, there began now to be some danger of dissimiarity, for he was in a line of admiration of Miss Crawford, which might lead him where Fanny could not follow. Miss Crawford's attractions did not lessen. The harp arrived, and rather added to her beauty, wit, and good humour; for she played with the greatest obligingness, with an expression and taste which were peculiarly becoming, and there was something clever to be said at the close of every air. Edmund was at the Parsonage every day, to be indulged with his favourite instrument: one morning secured an nvitation for the next; for the lady could not be inwilling to have a listener, and everything was soon in a fair train.

A young woman, pretty, lively, with a harp as elegant as herself, and both placed near a winlow, cut down to the ground, and opening on a ittle lawn, surrounded by shrubs in the rich foliage of summer, was enough to catch any man's neart. The season, the scene, the air, were all avourable to tenderness and sentiment. Mrs

[91]

Grant and her tambour frame were not withou their use: it was all in harmony; and as everything will turn to account when love is once set going even the sandwich tray, and Dr Grant doing the honours of it, were worth looking at. Without studying the business, however, or knowing what he was about, Edmund was beginning, at the end of a week of such intercourse, to be a good deal in love; and to the credit of the lady it may be added, that, without his being a man of the world or an elder brother, without any of the arts of flattery or the gaieties of small talk, he began to be agreeable to her. She felt it to be so, though she had not foreseen, and could hardly understand it; for he was not pleasant by any common rule; he talked no nonsense; he paid no compliments; his opinions were unbending, his attentions tranquil and simple. There was a charm, perhaps, in his sincerity, his steadiness, his integrity, which Miss Crawford might be equal to feel, though not equal to discuss with herself. She did not think very much about it, however: he pleased her for the present; she liked to have him near her; it was enough.

Fanny could not wonder that Edmund was at the Parsonage every morning; she would gladly have been there too, might she have gone in uninvited and unnoticed, to hear the harp; neither could she wonder that, when the evening stroll

[92]

The harp arrived and she played with the greatest obligingness was over, and the two families parted again, he should think it right to attend Mrs Grant and her sister to their home, while Mr Crawford was devoted to the ladies of the Park; but she thought it a very bad exchange; and if Edmund were not there to mix the wine and water for her, would rather go without it than not. She was a little surprised that he could spend so many hours with Miss Crawford, and not see more of the sort of fault which he had already observed, and of which she was almost always reminded by a something of the same nature whenever she was in her company; but so it was. Edmund was fond of speaking to her of Miss Crawford, but he seemed to think it enough that the Admiral had since been spared; and she scrupled to point out her own remarks to him, lest it should appear like ll nature. The first actual pain which Miss Crawford occasioned her was the consequence of in inclination to learn to ride, which the former aught soon after her being settled at Mansfield, from the example of the young ladies at the Park, and which, when Edmund's acquaintance with her increased, led to his encouraging the vish, and the offer of his own quiet mare for the ourpose of her first attempts, as the best fitted or a beginner, that either stable could furnish. No pain, no injury, however, was designed by im to his cousin in this offer: she was not to lose a day's exercise by it. The mare was only to be taken down to the Parsonage half an hour before her ride were to begin; and Fanny, on its being first proposed, so far from feeling slighted, was almost overpowered with gratitude that he should be asking her leave for it.

[93]

Miss Crawford made her first essay with great credit to herself, and no inconvenience to Fanny. Edmund, who had taken down the mare and presided at the whole, returned with it in excellent time, before either Fanny or the steady old coachman, who always attended her when she rode without her cousins, were ready to set forward. The second day's trial was not so guiltless. Miss Crawford's enjoyment of riding was such, that she did not know how to leave off. Active and fearless, and, though rather small, strongly made, she seemed formed for a horsewoman; and to the pure genuine pleasure of the exercise, something was probably added in Edmund's attendance and instructions, and something more in the conviction of very much surpassing her sex in general by her early progress, to make her unwilling to dismount. Fanny was ready and waiting, and Mrs Norris was beginning to scold her for not being gone, and still no horse was announced, no Edmund appeared. To avoid her aunt, and look for him, she went out.

The houses, though scarcely half a mile apart, [94] were not within sight of each other; but, by walking fifty vards from the hall door, she could look down the park, and command a view of the Parsonage and all its demesnes, gently rising beyond the village road; and in Dr Grant's meadow she immediately saw the group: Edmund and Miss Crawford both on horseback, riding side by side, Dr and Mrs Grant, and Mr Crawford, with two or three grooms, standing about and looking on. A happy party it appeared to her, all interested in one object: cheerful beyond a doubt, for the sound of merriment ascended even to her. It was a sound which did not make her cheerful; she wondered that Edmund should forget her, and felt a pang. She could not turn her eves from the meadow; she could not help watching all that passed. At first Miss Crawford and her companion made the circuit of the field, which was not small, at a foot's pace; then, at her apparent suggestion, they rose into a canter; and to Fanny's timid nature it was most astonishing to see how well she sat. After a few minutes, they stopped entirely. Edmund was close to her; he was speaking to her; he was evidently directing her management of the bridle; he had hold of her hand; she saw it, or the imagination supplied what the eye could not reach. She must not wonder at all this; what could be more natural than that Edmund should be making himself useful, and proving his good nature by any one? She could not but think, indeed, that Mr Crawford might as well have saved him the trouble; that it would have been particularly proper and becoming in a brother to have done it himself; but Mr Crawford, with all his boasted good-nature, and all his coachmanship, probably knew nothing of the matter, and had no active kindness in comparison of Edmund. She began to think it rather hard upon the mare to have such double duty; if she were forgotten, the poor mare should be remembered.

[95]

Her feelings for one and the other were soon a little tranquillized, by seeing the party in the meadow disperse, and Miss Crawford still on horseback, but attended by Edmund on foot, pass through a gate into the lane, and so into the park, and make towards the spot where she stood. She began then to be afraid of appearing rude and impatient; and walked to meet them with a great anxiety to avoid the suspicion.

"My dear Miss Price," said Miss Crawford, as soon as she was at all within hearing, "I am come to make my own apologies for keeping you waiting; but I have nothing in the world to say for myself. I knew it was very late, and that I was behaving extremely ill; and therefore, if you please, you must forgive me. Selfishness must always be forgiven, you know, because there is no hope of a cure."

[96]

"I am come to make my own apologies for keeping you waiting"

Fanny's answer was extremely civil, and Edmund added his conviction that she could be in no hurry. "For there is more than time enough for my cousin to ride twice as far as she ever goes," said he, "and you have been promoting her comfort by preventing her from setting off halfan-hour sooner: clouds are now coming up, and she will not suffer from the heat as she would have done then. I wish you may not be fatigued by so much exercise. I wish you had saved yourself this walk home."

"No part of it fatigues me but getting off this horse, I assure you," said she, as she sprang down with his help; "I am very strong. Nothing ever fatigues me, but doing what I do not like. Miss Price, I give way to you with a very bad grace; but I sincerely hope you will have a pleasant ride, and that I may have nothing but good to hear of this dear, delightful, beautiful animal."

The old coachman, who had been waiting about with his own horse, now joining them, Fanny was lifted on hers, and they set off across another part of the park; her feelings of discomfort not lightened by seeing, as she looked back, that the others were walking down the hill together to the village; nor did her attendant do her much good by his comments on Miss Crawford's great cleverness as a horsewoman, which he had been watching with an interest almost equal to her own.

[97]

"It is a pleasure to see a lady with such a good heart for riding!" said he. "I never see one sit a horse better. She did not seem to have a thought of fear. Very different from you, miss, when you first began, six years ago come next Easter. Lord bless you! how you did tremble when Sir Thomas first had you put on!"

In the drawing-room Miss Crawford was also celebrated. Her merit in being gifted by Nature with strength and courage, was fully appreciated by the Miss Bertrams; her delight in riding was like their own; her early excellence in it was like their own, and they had great pleasure in praising it.

"I was sure she would ride well," said Julia; "she has the make for it. Her figure is as neat as her brother's."

"Yes," added Maria, "and her spirits are as good, and she has the same energy of character. I cannot but think that good horsemanship has a great deal to do with the mind."

When they parted at night, Edmund asked Fanny whether she meant to ride the next day.

"No, I do not know—not if you want the mare," was her answer. "I do not want her at all for myself," said he; "but whenever you are next inclined to stay at home, I think Miss Crawford would be glad to have her a longer time for a whole morning, in short. She has a great desire to get as far as Mansfield Common; Mrs Grant has been telling her of its fine views, and I have no doubt of her being perfectly equal to it. But any morning will do for this. She would be extremely sorry to interfere with you. It would be very wrong if she did. She rides only for pleasure; you for health."

[98]

"I shall not ride to-morrow, certainly," said Fanny; "I have been out very often lately, and would rather stay at home. You know I am strong enough now to walk very well."

Edmund looked pleased, which must be Fanny's comfort, and the ride to Mansfield Common took place the next morning: the party included all the young people but herself, and was much enjoyed at the time, and doubly enjoyed again in the evening discussion. A successful scheme of this sort generally brings on another; and the having been to Mansfield Common disposed them all for going somewhere else the day after. There were many other views to be shown; and though the weather was hot, there were shady anes wherever they wanted to go. A young party is always provided with a shady lane. Four ine mornings successively were spent in this nanner, in showing the Crawfords the country, and doing the honours of its finest spots. Everyhing answered; it was all gaiety and good numour, the heat only supplying inconvenience enough to be talked of with pleasure—till the fourth day, when the happiness of one of the party was exceedingly clouded. Miss Bertram was the one. Edmund and Julia were invited to dine at the Parsonage, and she was excluded. It was meant and done by Mrs Grant, with perfect good humour, on Mr Rushworth's account, who was partly expected at the Park that day; but it was felt as a very grievous injury, and her good manners were severely taxed to conceal her vexation and anger till she reached home. As Mr Rushworth did not come, the injury was increased, and she had not even the relief of shewing her power over him; she could only be sullen to her mother, aunt, and cousin, and throw as great a gloom as possible over their dinner and dessert.

[99]

Between ten and eleven, Edmund and Julia walked into the drawing-room, fresh with the evening air, glowing and cheerful, the very rcverse of what they found in the three ladies sitting there, for Maria would scarcely raise her eyes from her book, and Lady Bertram was half asleep; and even Mrs Norris, discomposed by her niece's ill humour, and having asked one or two questions about the dinner, which were not immediately attended to, seemed almost determined to say no more. For a few minutes, the brother and sister were too eager in their praise of the night and their remarks on the stars, to think beyond chemselves; but when the first pause came, Edmund, looking around, said, "But where is Fanny? Is she gone to bed?"

[100]

"No, not that I know of," replied Mrs Norris; 'she was here a moment ago."

Her own gentle voice speaking from the other end of the room, which was a very long one, told them that she was on the sofa. Mrs Norris began colding.

"That is a very foolish trick, Fanny, to be dling away all the evening upon a sofa. Why cannot you come and sit here, and employ yourself as we do? If you have no work of your own, I can supply you from the poor basket. There is all the new calico, that was bought last week, not couched yet. I am sure I almost broke my back by cutting it out. You should learn to think of other people: and take my word for it, it is a shocking trick for a young person to be always olling upon a sofa."

Before half this was said, Fanny was returned to her seat at the table, and had taken up her work again; and Julia, who was in high good numour, from the pleasures of the day, did her he justice of exclaiming, "I must say, ma'am, hat Fanny is as little upon the sofa as anybody n the house."

"Fanny," said Edmund, after looking at her ttentively, "I am sure you have the headache."

She could not deny it, but said it was not very bad.

"I can hardly believe you," he replied; "I know your looks too well. How long have you had it?"

"Since a little before dinner. It is nothing but the heat."

"Did you go out in the heat?"

"Go out! to be sure she did," said Mrs Norris: "would you have her stay within such a fine day as this? Were not we all out? Even your mother was out to-day for above an hour."

"Yes, indeed, Edmund," added her ladyship, who had been thoroughly awakened by Mrs Norris's sharp reprimand to Fanny; "I was out above an hour. I sat three quarters of an hour in the flower-garden, while Fanny cut the roses, and very pleasant it was, I assure you, but very hot. It was shady enough in the alcove, but I declare I quite dreaded the coming home again."

"Fanny has been cutting roses, has she?"

"Yes, and I am afraid they will be the last this year. Poor thing! She found it hot enough; but they were so full blown that one could not wait."

"There was no help for it, certainly," rejoined Mrs Norris, in a rather softened voice; "but I question whether her headache might not be caught then, sister. There is nothing so likely to give it as standing and stooping in a hot sun; but

[102]

I dare say it will be well to-morrow. Suppose you let her have your aromatic vinegar; I always forget to have mine filled."

"She has got it," said Lady Bertram; "she has had it ever since she came back from your house the second time."

"What!" cried Edmund; "has she been walkng as well as cutting roses; walking across the not park to your house, and doing it twice, na'am? No wonder her head aches."

Mrs Norris was talking to Julia, and did not near.

"I was afraid it would be too much for her," said Lady Bertram; "but when the roses were gathered, your aunt wished to have them, and then you know they must be taken home."

"But were there roses enough to oblige her to twice?"

"No; but they were to be put into the spare room to dry; and, unluckily, Fanny forgot to ock the door of the room and bring away the key, to she was obliged to go again."

Edmund got up and walked about the room, aying, "And could nobody be employed on such an errand but Fanny? Upon my word, ma'am, t has been a very ill-managed business."

"I am sure I do not know how it was to have been done better," cried Mrs Norris, unable to be longer deaf; "unless I had gone myself, indeed, but I cannot be in two places at once; and I was talking to Mr Green at that very time about your mother's dairymaid, by her desire, and had promised John Groom to write to Mrs Jefferies about his son, and the poor fellow was waiting for me half an hour. I think nobody can justly accuse me of sparing myself upon any occasion, but really I cannot do everything at once. And as for Fanny's just stepping down to my house for me—it is not much above a quarter of a mile—I cannot think I was unreasonable to ask it. How often do I pace it three times a day, early and late, ay, and in all weathers too, and say nothing about it?"

[103]

"I wish Fanny had half your strength, ma'am."

"If Fanny would be more regular in her exercise, she would not be knocked up so soon. She has not been out on horseback now this long while, and I am persuaded, that when she does not ride, she ought to walk. If she had been riding before, I should not have asked it of her. But I thought it would rather do her good after being stooping among the roses; for there is nothing so refreshing as a walk after a fatigue of that kind; and though the sun was strong, it was not so very hot. Between ourselves, Edmund," nodding significantly at his mother, "it was cutting the roses, and dawdling about in the flower-garden, that did the mischief."

[104]

"I am afraid it was, indeed," said the more candid Lady Bertram, who had overheard her; "I am very much afraid she caught the headache there, for the heat was enough to kill anybody. It was as much as I could bear myself. Sitting and calling to Pug, and trying to keep him from the flower-beds, was almost too much for me."

Edmund said no more to either lady; but going quietly to another table, on which the supper tray yet remained, brought a glass of Madeira to Fanny, and obliged her to drink the greater part. She wished to be able to decline it; but the tears, which a variety of feelings created, made it easier to swallow than to speak.

Vexed as Edmund was with his mother and aunt, he was still more angry with himself. His own forgetfulness of her was worse than anything which they had done. Nothing of this would have happened had she been properly considered; but she had been left four days together without any choice of companions or exercise, and without any excuse for avoiding whatever her unreasonable aunts might require. He was ashamed to think that for four days together she had not had the power of riding, and very seribusly resolved, however unwilling he must be to check a pleasure of Miss Crawford's, that it should never happen again.

Fanny went to bed with her heart as full as on the first evening of her arrival at the Park. The state of her spirits had probably had its share in her indisposition; for she had been feeling ne glected, and been struggling against disconten and envy for some days past. As she leant on the sofa, to which she had retreated that she might not be seen, the pain of her mind had been much beyond that in her head; and the sudden change which Edmund's kindness had then occasioned made her hardly know how to support herself.

[105]

CHAPTER VIII

F ANNY'S rides recommenced the very next day; and as it was a pleasant fresh-feeling morning, less hot than the weather had lately been, Edmund trusted that her losses both of health and pleasure would be soon made good. While she was gone, Mr Rushworth arrived, escorting his mother, who came to be civil and to show her civility especially, in urging the execution of the plan for visiting Sotherton, which had been started a fortnight before, and which, in consequence of her subsequent absence from home, had since lain dormant. Mrs Norris and her nieces were all well pleased with its revival, and an early day was named, and agreed to, provided Mr Crawford should be disengaged; he young ladies did not forget that stipulation, nd though Mrs Norris would willingly have nswered for his being so, they would neither uthorize the liberty, nor run the risk; and at last, n a hint from Miss Bertram, Mr Rushworth disovered that the properest thing to be done was for him to walk down to the Parsonage directly, nd call on Mr Crawford, and inquire whether Vednesday would suit him or not.

[106]

Before his return, Mrs Grant and Miss Craword came in. Having been out some time, and aken a different route to the house, they had not net him. Comfortable hopes, however, were riven that he would find Mr Crawford at home. The Sotherton scheme was mentioned of course. t was hardly possible, indeed, that anything else hould be talked of, for Mrs Norris was in high pirits about it; and Mrs Rushworth, a well-meanng, civil, prosing, pompous woman, who thought othing of consequence, but as it related to her wn and her son's concerns, had not yet given ver pressing Lady Bertram to be of the party. Lady Bertram constantly declined it; but her lacid manner of refusal made Mrs Rushworth till think she wished to come, till Mrs Norris's nore numerous words and louder tone convinced er of the truth.

"The fatigue would be too much for my sister, great deal too much, I assure you, my dear Mrs Rushworth. Ten miles there, and ten back you know. You must excuse my sister on thi occasion, and accept of our two dear girls and myself without her. Sotherton is the only place that could give her a wish to go so far, but it can not be, indeed. She will have a companion in Fanny Price, you know, so it will all do very well and as for Edmund, as he is not here to speak for himself, I will answer for his being most happy to join the party. He can go on horseback, you know."

[107]

Mrs Rushworth being obliged to yield to Lady Bertram's staying at home, could only be sorry "The loss of her ladyship's company would be a great drawback, and she should have been extremely happy to have seen the young lady too Miss Price, who had never been at Sotherton yet and it was a pity she should not see the place."

"You are very kind, you are all kindness, my dear madam," cried Mrs Norris; "but as to Fanny, she will have opportunities in plenty of seeing Sotherton. She has time enough before her; and her going now is quite out of the question. Lady Bertram could not possibly spare her."

"Oh no! I cannot do without Fanny."

Mrs Rushworth proceeded next, under the conviction that everybody must be wanting to see Sotherton, to include Miss Crawford in the invi-[108]

ation; and though [Mrs]* Grant, who had not een at the trouble of visiting Mrs Rushworth, on er coming into the neighbourhood, civilly delined it on her own account; she was glad to sesure any pleasure for her sister; and Mary, proprly pressed and persuaded, was not long in acepting her share of the civility. Mr Rushworth ame back from the Parsonage successful; and Edmund made his appearance just in time to earn what had been settled for Wednesday, to ttend Mrs Rushworth to her carriage, and walk alf way down the park with the two other ladies. On his return to the breakfast-room, he found Irs Norris trying to make up her mind as to whether Miss Crawford's being of the party were lesirable or not, or whether her brother's arouche would not be full without her. The Aiss Bertrams laughed at the idea, assuring her hat the barouche would hold four perfectly well, ndependent of the box, on which one might go vith him.

"But why is it necessary," said Edmund, "that Crawford's carriage, or his only, should be emloyed? Why is no use to be made of my nother's chaise? I could not, when the scheme was first mentioned the other day, understand why a visit from the family were not to be made in the carriage of the family."

[109]

* Printed "Miss" in the early editions.

"What!" cried Julia: "go box'd up three in a post-chaise in this weather, when we may have seats in a barouche! No, my dear Edmund, that will not quite do."

"Besides," said Maria, "I know that Mr Crawford depends upon taking us. After what passed at first, he would claim it as a promise."

"And, my dear Edmund," added Mrs Norris, "taking out two carriages when one will do, would be trouble for nothing; and, between ourselves, coachman is not very fond of the roads between this and Sotherton; he always complains bitterly of the narrow lanes scratching his carriage, and you know one should not like to have dear Sir Thomas, when he comes home, find all the varnish scratched off."

"That would not be a very handsome reason for using Mr Crawford's," said Maria; "but the truth is, that Wilcox is a stupid old fellow, and does not know how to drive. I will answer for it, that we shall find no inconvenience from narrow roads on Wednesday."

"There is no hardship, I suppose, nothing unpleasant," said Edmund, "in going on the barouche-box."

"Unpleasant!" cried Maria: "oh dear! I believe it would be generally thought the favourite seat. There can be no comparison as to one's view of the country. Probably Miss Crawford will choose the barouche box herself."

[110]

"There can be no objection, then, to Fanny's going with you; there can be no doubt of your having room for her."

"Fanny!" repeated Mrs Norris; "my dear Edmund, there is no idea of her going with us. She stays with her aunt. I told Mrs Rushworth to. She is not expected."

"You can have no reason, I imagine, madam," aid he, addressing his mother, "for wishing Fanny not to be of the party, but as it relates to yourself, to your own comfort. If you could do without her, you would not wish to keep her at nome?"

"To be sure not, but I cannot do without her."

"You can, if I stay at home with you, as I nean to do."

There was a general cry out at this. "Yes," he ontinued, "there is no necessity for my going, nd I mean to stay at home. Fanny has a great esire to see Sotherton. I know she wishes it ery much. She has not often a gratification of he kind, and I am sure, ma'am, you would be lad to give her the pleasure now?"

"Oh, yes! very glad, if your aunt sees no objecon."

Mrs Norris was very ready with the only obection which could remain—their having posively assured Mrs Rushworth that Fanny could ot go, and the very strange appearance there would consequently be in taking her, whic seemed to her a difficulty quite impossible to b got over. It must have the strangest appearance It would be something so very unceremonious, s bordering on disrespect for Mrs Rushworth whose own manners were such a pattern of good breeding and attention, that she really did no feel equal to it. Mrs Norris had no affection fo Fanny, and no wish of procuring her pleasure a any time; but her opposition to Edmund now arose more from partiality for her own scheme because it was her own, than from anything else She felt that she had arranged everything ex tremely well, and that any alteration must be for the worse. When Edmund, therefore, told her in reply, as he did when she would give him the hear ing, that she need not distress herself on Mr. Rushworth's account, because he had taken the opportunity as he walked with her through the hall of mentioning Miss Price as one who would probably be of the party, and had directly received a very sufficient invitation for [his]* cousin, Mrs Norris was too much vexed to submit with a very good grace, and would only say "Very well, very well, just as you choose, settle it your own way, I am sure I do not care about it."

[111]

"It seems very odd," said Maria, "that you should be staying at home instead of Fanny."

* Printed "her" in the early editions.

[112]

"I am sure she ought to be very much obliged o you," added Julia, hastily leaving the room as he spoke, from a consciousness that she ought to offer to stay at home herself.

"Fanny will feel quite as grateful as the occaion requires," was Edmund's only reply, and the ubject dropt.

Fanny's gratitude, when she heard the plan, vas, in fact, much greater than her pleasure. She felt Edmund's kindness with all, and more han all, the sensibility which he, unsuspicious of her fond attachment, could be aware of; but that he should forego any enjoyment on her account gave her pain, and her own satisfaction in seeing Sotherton would be nothing without him.

The next meeting of the two Mansfield famlies produced another alteration in the plan, and one that was admitted with general approbation. Ars Grant offered herself as companion for the lay to Lady Bertram in lieu of her son, and Dr Grant was to join them at dinner. Lady Berram was very well pleased to have it so, and the roung ladies were in spirits again. Even Edmund was very thankful for an arrangement which restored him to his share of the party; and Ars Norris thought it an excellent plan, and had at her tongue's end, and was on the point of roposing it, when Mrs Grant spoke.

Wednesday was fine, and soon after breakfast the barouche arrived, Mr Crawford driving his sisters; and as everybody was ready, there was nothing to be done but for Mrs Grant to alight and the others to take their places. The place of all places, the envied seat, the post of honour was unappropriated. To whose happy lot was it to fall? While each of the Miss Bertrams was meditating how best, and with the most appear ance of obliging the others, to secure it, the matter was settled by Mrs Grant's saying, as she stepped from the carriage, "As there are five of you, it will be better that one should sit with Henry; and as you were saying lately that you wished you could drive, Julia, I think this will be a good opportunity for you to take a lesson."

[113]

Happy Julia! Unhappy Maria! The former was on the barouche-box in a moment, the latter took her seat within, in gloom and mortification; and the carriage drove off amid the good wishes of the two remaining ladies, and the barking of pug in his mistress's arms.

Their road was through a pleasant country; and Fanny, whose rides had never been extensive, was soon beyond her knowledge, and was very happy in observing all that was new, and admiring all that was pretty. She was not often invited to join in the conversation of the others, nor did she desire it. Her own thoughts and reflections were habitually her best companions; [114] nd, in observing the appearance of the country, ne bearings of the roads, the difference of soil, ne state of the harvest, the cottages, the cattle, ne children, she found entertainment that could nly have been heightened by having Edmund to peak to of what she felt. That was the only oint of resemblance between her and the lady ho sat by her; in everything but a value for dmund, Miss Crawford was very unlike her. he had none of Fanny's delicacy of taste, of ind, of feeling; she saw Nature, inanimate lature, with little observation; her attention was Il for men and women, her talents for the light nd lively. In looking back after Edmund, howver, when there was any stretch of road behind nem, or when he gained on them in ascending a onsiderable hill, they were united, and a "there e is" broke at the same moment from them both, ore than once.

For the first seven miles Miss Bertram had ery little real comfort; her prospect always ided in Mr Crawford and her sister sitting side y side, full of conversation and merriment; and o see only his expressive profile as he turned with smile to Julia, or to catch the laugh of the ther, was a perpetual source of irritation, which er own sense of propriety could but just smooth ver. When Julia looked back, it was with a puntenance of delight, and whenever she spoke to them, it was in the highest spirits: "her view of the country was charming, she wished they could all see it," &c.; but her only offer of ex change was addressed to Miss Crawford, as they gained the summit of a long hill, and was no more inviting than this: "Here is a fine burst of country. I wish you had my seat, but I dare say you will not take it, let me press you ever so much;" and Miss Crawford could hardly answer before they were moving again at a good pace.

[115]

When they came within the influence of Soth erton associations, it was better for Miss Ber tram who might be said to have two strings to her bow. She had Rushworth-feelings, and Craw ford-feelings, and in the vicinity of Sotherton the former had considerable effect. Mr Rush worth's consequence was hers. She could not tel Miss Crawford that "those woods belonged to Sotherton;" she could not carelessly observe that "she believed that it was now all Mr Rushworth' property on each side of the road," without ela tion of heart; and it was a pleasure to increase with their approach to the capital freehold man sion, and ancient manorial residence of the fam ily, with all its rights of court-leet and court baron.

"Now, we shall have no more rough road, Miss Crawford; our difficulties are over. The rest of the way is such as it ought to be. Mr Rushworth [116]

s made it since he succeeded to the estate. ere begins the village. Those cottages are ally a disgrace. The church spire is reckoned markably handsome. I am glad the church is t so close to the great house as often happens old places. The annoyance of the bells must terrible. There is the parsonage; a tidy-lookg house, and I understand the clergyman and s wife are very decent people. Those are almsuses, built by some of the family. To the ght is the steward's house; he is a very respectle man. Now, we are coming to the lodgetes; but we have nearly a mile through the park II. It is not ugly, you see, at this end; there is me fine timber, but the situation of the house is eadful. We go down hill to it for half a mile, d it is a pity, for it would not be an ill-looking ace if it had a better approach."

Miss Crawford was not slow to admire; she etty well guessed Miss Bertram's feelings, and ade it a point of honour to promote her enjoyent to the utmost. Mrs Norris was all delight d volubility; and even Fanny had something to y in admiration, and might be heard with comacency. Her eye was eagerly taking in everying within her reach; and after being at some ins to get a view of the house, and observing at "it was a sort of building which she could t look at but with respect," she added, "Now, where is the avenue? The house fronts the east I perceive. The avenue, therefore, must be the back of it. Mr Rushworth talked of the way front."

[117]

"Yes, it is exactly behind the house; begins a little distance, and ascends for half-a-mile the extremity of the grounds. You may s something of it here—something of the more d tant trees. It is oak entirely."

Miss Bertram could now speak with decide information of what she had known nothin about, when Mr Rushworth had asked he opinion; and her spirits were in as happy a flutt as vanity and pride could furnish, when the drove up to the spacious stone steps before the principal entrance.

CHAPTER IX

M R RUSHWORTH was at the door receive his fair lady; and the who party were welcomed by him with du attention. In the drawing-room they were me with equal cordiality by the mother, and Mis Bertram had all the distinction with each that sh could wish. After the business of arriving was over, it was first necessary to eat, and the door [118] ere thrown open to admit them through one or wo intermediate rooms into the appointed dinng-parlour, where a collation was prepared with bundance and elegance. Much was said, and nuch was ate, and all went well. The particular bject of the day was then considered. How rould Mr Crawford like, in what manner would e choose, to take a survey of the grounds? Mr tushworth mentioned his curricle. Mr Craword suggested the greater desirableness of some arriage which might convey more than two. To be depriving themselves of the advantage of ther eyes and other judgments, might be an evil ven beyond the loss of present pleasure."

Mrs Rushworth proposed that the chaise hould be taken also; but this was scarcely reeived as an amendment: the young ladies neither miled nor spoke. Her next proposition, of hewing the house to such of them as had not been here before, was more acceptable, for Miss Bertram was pleased to have its size displayed, nd all were glad to be doing something.

The whole party rose accordingly, and under Irs Rushworth's guidance were shewn through number of rooms, all lofty, and many large, and mply furnished in the taste of fifty years back, with shining floors, solid mahogany, rich damask, narble, gilding, and carving, each handsome in as way. Of pictures there were abundance, and some few good, but the larger part were family portraits, no longer anything to anybody but Mrs Rushworth, who had been at great pains to learn all that the housekeeper could teach, and was now almost equally well qualified to shew the house. On the present occasion, she addressed herself chiefly to Miss Crawford and Fanny, but there was no comparison in the willingness of their attention; for Miss Crawford, who had seen scores of great houses, and cared for none of them, had only the appearance of civilly listening, while Fanny, to whom everything was almost as interesting as it was new, attended with unaffected earnestness to all that Mrs Rushworth could relate of the family in former times, its rise and grandeur, regal visits and loyal efforts, delighted to connect anything with history already known, or warm her imagination with scenes of the past.

[119]

The situation of the house excluded the possibility of much prospect from any of the rooms; and while Fanny and some of the others were attending Mrs Rushworth, Henry Crawford was looking grave and shaking his head at the windows. Every room on the west front looked across a lawn to the beginning of the avenue immediately beyond tall iron palisades and gates.

Having visited many more rooms than could be supposed to be of any other use than to contribute to the window tax, and find employment for housemaids, "Now," said Mrs Rushworth, "we are coming to the chapel, which properly we ought to enter from above, and look down upon: but as we are quite among friends, I will take you in this way, if you will excuse me."

[120]

They entered. Fanny's imagination had prepared her for something grander than a mere spacious, oblong room, fitted up for the purpose of devotion: with nothing more striking or more solemn than the profusion of mahogany, and the crimson velvet cushions appearing over the ledge of the family gallery above. "I am disappointed," said she, in a low voice to Edmund. "This is not my idea of a chapel. There is nothing awful here, nothing melancholy, nothing grand. Here are no aisles, no arches, no inscriptions, no banners. No banners, cousin, to be 'blown by the night wind of heaven.' No signs that a 'Scottish monarch sleeps below."

"You forget, Fanny, how lately all this has been built, and for how confined a purpose, compared with the old chapels of castles and monasteries. It was only for the private use of the family. They have been buried, I suppose, in the parish church. There you must look for the banners and the atchievements."

"It was foolish of me not to think of all that; but I am disappointed."

Mrs Rushworth began her relation. "This chapel was fitted up as you see it, in James the Second's time. Before that period, as I understand, the pews were only wainscot; and there is some reason to think that the linings and cushions of the pulpit and family seat were only purple cloth; but this is not quite certain. It is a handsome chapel, and was formerly in constant use both morning and evening. Prayers were always read in it by the domestic chaplain, within the memory of many; but the late Mr Rushworth left it off."

"Every generation has its improvements," said Miss Crawford, with a smile, to Edmund.

Mrs Rushworth was gone to repeat her lesson to Mr Crawford; and Edmund, Fanny and Miss Crawford, remained in a cluster together.

"It is a pity," cried Fanny, "that the custom should have been discontinued. It was a valuable part of former times. There is something in a chapel and chaplain so much in character with a great house, with one's ideas of what such a household should be! A whole family assembling regularly for the purpose of prayer is fine!"

"Very fine, indeed," said Miss Crawford, laughing. "It must do the heads of the family a great deal of good to force all the poor housemaids and footmen to leave business and pleasure, and say their prayers here twice a-day, while they are inventing excuses themselves for staying away."

[122]

"That is hardly Fanny's idea of a family assembling," said Edmund. "If the master and mistress do not attend themselves, there must be more harm than good in the custom."

"At any rate, it is safer to leave people to their own devices on such subjects. Everybody likes to go their own way-to choose their own time and manner of devotion. The obligation of attendance, the formality, the restraint, the length of time-altogether it is a formidable thing, and what nobody likes; and if the good people who used to kneel and gape in that gallery could have foreseen that the time would ever come when men and women might lie another ten minutes in bed, when they woke with a headache, without danger of reprobation, because chapel was missed, they would have jumped with joy and envy. Cannot you imagine with what unwilling feelings the former belles of the house of Rushworth did many a time repair to this chapel? The young Mrs Eleanors and Mrs Bridgets-starched up into seeming piety, but with heads full of something very different-especially if the poor chaplain were not worth looking at-and, in those days, I fancy parsons were very inferior even to what they are now."

For a few moments she was unanswered,

[123]

Fanny coloured and looked at Edmund, but felt too angry for speech; and he needed a little recollection before he could say, "Your lively mind can hardly be serious even on serious subjects. You have given us an amusing sketch, and human nature cannot say it was not so. We must all feel at times the difficulty of fixing our thoughts as we could wish; but if you are supposing it a frequent thing, that is to say, a weakness grown into a habit from neglect, what could be expected from the private devotions of such persons? Do you think the minds which are suffered, which are indulged in wanderings in a chapel, would be more collected in a closet?"

"Yes, very likely. They would have two chances at least in their favour. There would be less to distract the attention from without, and it would not be tried so long."

"The mind which does not struggle against itself under one circumstance, would find objects to distract it in the other, I believe; and the influence of the place and of example may often rouse better feelings than are begun with. The greater length of the service, however, I admit to be sometimes too hard a stretch upon the mind. One wishes it were not so; but I have not yet left Oxford long enough to forget what chapel prayers are."

While this was passing, the rest of the party [124] being scattered about the chapel, Julia called Mr Crawford's attention to her sister, by saying, "Do look at Mr Rushworth and Maria, standing side by side, exactly as if the ceremony were going to be performed. Have not they completely the air of it?"

Mr Crawford smiled his acquiescence, and stepping forward to Maria, said, in a voice which she only could hear, "I do not like to see Miss Bertram so near the altar."

Starting, the lady instinctively moved a step or two, but recovering herself in a moment, affected to laugh, and asked him, in a tone not much louder, "If he would give her away?"

"I am afraid I should do it very awkwardly," was his reply, with a look of meaning.

Julia, joining them at the moment, carried on the joke.

"Upon my word, it is really a pity that it should not take place directly, if we had but a proper license, for here we are altogether, and nothing in the world could be more snug and pleasant." And she talked and laughed about it with so little caution, as to catch the comprehension of Mr Rushworth and his mother, and expose her sister to the whispered gallantries of her lover, while Mrs Rushworth spoke with proper smiles and dignity of its being a most happy event to her whenever it took place.

"If Edmund were but in orders!" cried Julia, and running to where he stood with Miss Crawford and Fanny: "My dear Edmund, if you were but in orders now, you might perform the ceremony directly. How unlucky that you are not ordained; Mr Rushworth and Maria are quite ready."

Miss Crawford's countenance, as Julia spoke, might have amused a disinterested observer. She looked almost aghast under the new idea she was receiving. Fanny pitied her. "How distressed she will be at what she said just now," passed across her mind.

"Ordained!" said Miss Crawford; "what, are you to be a clergyman?"

"Yes; I shall take orders soon after my father's return; probably at Christmas."

Miss Crawford rallying her spirits, and recovering her complexion, replied only, "If I had known this before, I would have spoken of the cloth with more respect," and turned the subject.

The chapel was soon afterwards left to the silence and stillness which reigned in it, with few interruptions, throughout the year. Miss Bertram, displeased with her sister, led the way, and all seemed to feel that they had been there long enough.

The lower part of the house had been now entirely shown, and Mrs Rushworth, never weary in the cause, would have proceeded towards the principal staircase, and taken them through all the rooms above, if her son had not interposed with a doubt of there being time enough. "For if," said he, with the sort of self-evident proposition which many a clearer head does not always avoid, "we are too long going over the house, we shall not have time for what is to be done out of doors. It is past two, and we are to dine at five."

[126]

Mrs Rushworth submitted; and the question of surveying the grounds with the who and the how was likely to be more fully agitated, and Mrs Norris was beginning to arrange by what junction of carriages and horses most could be done, when the young people, meeting with an outward door, temptingly open on a flight of steps which led immediately to turf and shrubs, and all the sweets of pleasure-grounds, as by one impulse, one wish for air and liberty, all walked out.

"Suppose we turn down here for the present," said Mrs Rushworth, civilly taking the hint and following them. "Here are the greatest number of our plants, and here are the curious pheasants."

"Query," said Mr Crawford, looking round him, "whether we may not find something to employ us here, before we go farther? I see walls of great promise. Mr Rushworth, shall we summon a council on this lawn?" "James," said Mrs Rushworth to her son, "I believe the wilderness will be new to all the party. The Miss Bertrams have never seen the wilderness yet."

No objection was made, but for some time there seemed no inclination to move in any plan, or to any distance. All were attracted at first by the plants or the pheasants, and all dispersed about in happy independence. Mr Crawford was the first to move forward, to examine the capabilities of that end of the house. The lawn, bounded on each side by a high wall, contained beyond the first planted area a bowling-green, and beyond the bowling-green a long terrace walk, backed by iron palisades, and commanding a view over them into the tops of the trees of the wilderness immediately adjoining. It was a good spot for fault-finding. Mr Crawford was soon followed by Miss Bertram and Mr Rushworth; and when, after a little time, the others began to form into parties, these three were found in busy consultation on the terrace by Edmund, Miss Crawford, and Fanny, who seemed as naturally to unite, and who, after a short participation of their regrets and difficulties, left them and walked on. The remaining three, Mrs Rushworth, Mrs Norris, and Julia, were still far behind; for Julia, whose happy star no longer prevailed, was obliged to keep by the side of Mrs [128]

Rushworth, and restrain her impatient feet to that lady's slow pace, while her aunt, having fallen in with the housekeeper, who was come out to feed the pheasants, was lingering behind in gossip with her. Poor Julia, the only one out of the nine not tolerably satisfied with their lot, was now in a state of complete penance, and as different from the Julia of the barouche-box as could well be imagined. The politeness which she had been brought up to practise as a duty made it impossible for her to escape; while the want of that higher species of self-command, that just consideration of others, that knowledge of her own heart, that principle of her education, made her miserable under it.

"This is insufferably hot," said Miss Crawford, when they had taken one turn on the terrace, and were drawing a second time to the door in the middle which opened to the wilderness. "Shall any of us object to being comfortable? Here is a nice little wood, if one can but get into it. What happiness if the door should not be locked! but of course it is; for in these great places the gardeners are the only people who can go where they like."

The door, however, proved not to be locked, and they were all agreed in turning joyfully through it, and leaving the unmitigated glare of day behind. A considerable flight of steps landed them in the wilderness, which was a planted wood of about two acres, and though chiefly of larch and laurel, and beech cut down, and though laid out with too much regularity, was darkness and shade, and natural beauty, compared with the bowling-green and the terrace. They all felt the refreshment of it, and for some time could only walk and admire. At length, after a short pause, Miss Crawford began with, "So you are to be a clergyman, Mr Bertram. This is rather a surprise to me."

[129]

"Why should it surprise you? You must suppose me designed for some profession, and might perceive that I am neither a lawyer, nor a soldier, nor a sailor."

"Very true; but, in short, it had not occurred to me. And you know there is generally an uncle or a grandfather to leave a fortune to the second son."

"A very praiseworthy practice," said Edmund, "but not quite universal. I am one of the exceptions, and being one, must do something for myself."

"But why are you to be clergyman? I thought that was always the lot of the youngest, where there were many to choose before him."

"Do you think the church itself never chosen, then?"

"Never is a black word. But yes, in the never of conversation, which means not very often, I do think it. For what is to be done in the church? Men love to distinguish themselves, and in either of the other lines distinction may be gained, but not in the church. A clergyman is nothing."

[130]

"The nothing of conversation has its gradations, I hope, as well as the never. A clergyman cannot be high in state or fashion. He must not head mobs, or set the ton in dress. But I cannot call that situation nothing which has the charge of all that is of the first importance to mankind, individually or collectively considered, temporally and eternally, which has the guardianship of religion and morals, and consequently of the manners which result from their influence. No one here can call the office nothing. If the man who holds it is so, it is by the neglect of his duty, by foregoing its just importance, and stepping out of his place to appear what he ought not to appear."

"You assign greater consequence to the clergyman than one has been used to hear given, or than I can quite comprehend. One does not see much of this influence and importance in society, and how can it be acquired where they are so seldom seen themselves? How can two sermons a week, even supposing them worth hearing, supposing the preacher to have the sense to prefer Blair's to his own, do all that you speak of? govern the conduct and fashion the manners of a large congregation for the rest of the week? One scarcely sees a clergyman out of his pulpit."

[131]

"You are speaking of London, I am speaking of the nation at large."

"The metropolis, I imagine, is a pretty fair sample of the rest."

"Not, I should hope, of the proportion of virtue to vice throughout the kingdom. We do not look in great cities for our best morality. It is not there that respectable people of any denomination can do most good; and it certainly is not there that the influence of the clergy can be most felt. A fine preacher is followed and admired; but it is not in fine preaching only that a good clergyman will be useful in his parish and his neighbourhood, where the parish and neighbourhood are of a size capable of knowing his private character, and observing his general conduct, which in London can rarely be the case. The clergy are lost there in the crowds of their parishioners. They are known to the largest part only as preachers. And with regard to their influencing public manners, Miss Crawford must not misunderstand me, or suppose I mean to call them the arbiters of good breeding, the regulators of refinement and courtesy, the masters of the ceremonies of life. The manners I speak of might rather be called conduct, perhaps, the result of good principles; the effect, in short, of those doctrines which it is their duty to teach and recommend; and it will, I believe, be everywhere found, that as the clergy are, or are not what they ought to be, so are the rest of the nation."

[132]

"Certainly," said Fanny, with gentle earnestness.

"There," cried Miss Crawford, "you have quite convinced Miss Price already."

"I wish I could convince Miss Crawford too."

"I do not think you ever will," said she, with an arch smile; "I am just as much surprised now as I was at first that you should intend to take orders. You really are fit for something better. Come, do change your mind. It is not too late. Go into the law."

"Go into the law! With as much ease as I was told to go into this wilderness."

"Now you are going to say something about law being the worst wilderness of the two, but I forestall you; remember, I have forestalled you."

"You need not hurry when the object is only to prevent my saying a bon-mot, for there is not the least wit in my nature. I am a very matterof-fact, plain-spoken being, and may blunder on the borders of a repartee for half-an-hour together without striking it out."

A general silence succeeded. Each was thoughtful. Fanny made the first interruption

[133]

by saying, "I wonder that I should be tired with only walking in this sweet wood; but the next time we come to a seat, if it is not disagreeable to you, I should be glad to sit down for a little while."

"My dear Fanny," cried Edmund, immediately drawing her arm within his, "how thoughtless I have been! I hope you are not very tired. Perhaps," turning to Miss Crawford, "my other companion may do me the honour of taking an arm."

"Thank you, but I am not at all tired." She took it, however, as she spoke, and the gratification of having her do so, of feeling such a connection for the first time, made him a little forgetful of Fanny. "You scarcely touch me," said he. "You do not make me of any use. What a difference in the weight of woman's arm from that of a man! At Oxford I have been a good deal used to have a man lean on me for the length of a street, and you are only a fly in the comparison."

"I am really not tired, which I almost wonder at; for we must have walked at least a mile in this wood. Do not you think we have?"

"Not half a mile," was his sturdy answer; for he was not yet so much in love as to measure distance, or reckon time, with feminine lawlessness.

"Oh! you do not consider how much we have [134] wound about. We have taken such a very serpentine course, and the wood itself must be half a mile long in a straight line, for we have never seen the end of it yet since we left the first great path."

"But if you remember, before we left that first great path, we saw directly to the end of it. We looked down the whole vista, and saw it closed by iron gates, and it could not have been more than a furlong in length."

"Oh! I know nothing of your furlongs, but I am sure it is a very long wood, and that we have been winding in and out ever since we came into it; and, therefore, when I say that we have walked a mile in it, I must speak within compass."

"We have been exactly a quarter of an hour here," said Edmund, taking out his watch. "Do you think we are walking four miles an hour?"

"Oh! do not attack me with your watch. A watch is always too fast or too slow. I cannot be dictated to by a watch."

A few steps farther brought them out at the bottom of the very walk they had been talking of; and standing back, well shaded and sheltered, and looking over a ha-ha into the park, was a comfortable-sized bench on which they all sat down.

"I am afraid you are very tired, Fanny," said Edmund, observing her; "why would not you speak sooner? This will be a bad day's amusement for you if you are to be knocked up. Every sort of exercise fatigues her so soon, Miss Crawford, except riding."

[135]

"How abominable in you, then, to let me engross her horse as I did all last week! I am ashamed of you and of myself, but it shall never happen again."

"Your attentiveness and consideration makes me more sensible of my own neglect. Fanny's interest seems in safer hands with you than with me."

"That she should be tired now, however, gives me no surprise; for there is nothing in the course of one's duties so fatiguing as what we have been doing this morning: seeing a great house, dawdling from one room to another, straining one's eyes and one's attention, hearing what one does not understand, admiring what one does not care for. It is generally allowed to be the greatest bore in the world, and Miss Price has found it so, though she did not know it."

"I shall soon be rested," said Fanny; "to sit in the shade on a fine day, and look upon verdure, is the most perfect refreshment."

After sitting a little while, Miss Crawford was up again. "I must move," said she, resting fatigues me. I have looked across the ha-ha till I am weary. I must go and look through that [136] iron gate at the same view, without being able to see it so well."

Edmund left the seat likewise. "Now, Miss Crawford, if you will look up the walk, you will convince yourself that it cannot be half a mile long, or half half a mile."

"It is an immense distance," said she; "I see that with a glance."

He still reasoned with her, but in vain. She would not calculate, she would not compare. She would only smile and assert. The greatest degree of rational consistency could not have been more engaging, and they talked with mutual satisfaction. At last it was agreed that they should endeavour to determine the dimensions of the wood by walking a little more about it. They would go to one end of it, in the line they were then in (for there was a straight green walk along the bottom by the side of the ha-ha), and perhaps turn a little way in some other direction, if it seemed likely to assist them, and be back in a few minutes. Fanny said she was rested, and would have moved too, but this was not suffered. Edmund urged her remaining where she was with an earnestness which she could not resist, and she was left on the bench to think with pleasure of her cousin's care, but with great regret that she was not stronger. She watched them till they had turned the corner, and listened till all sound of them had ceased.

[137]

CHAPTER X

A QUARTER of an hour, twenty minutes, passed away, and Fanny was still thinking of Edmund, Miss Crawford, and herself, without interruption from any one. She began to be surprised at being left so long, and to listen with an anxious desire of hearing their steps and their voices again. She listened, and at length she heard; she heard voices and feet approaching; but she had just satisfied herself that it was not those she wanted, when Miss Bertram, Mr Rushworth, and Mr Crawford, issued from the same path which she had trod herself, and were before her.

"Miss Price all alone!" and "my dear Fanny, how comes this?" were the first salutations. She told her story. "Poor dear Fanny," cried her cousin, "how ill you have been used by them! You had better have staid with us."

Then seating herself with a gentleman on each side, she resumed the conversation which had engaged them before, and discussed the possibility of improvements with much animation. Nothing was fixed on; but Henry Crawford was full of ideas and projects, and, generally speaking, whatever he proposed was immediately approved, first by her, and then by Mr Rushworth, whose principal business seemed to be to hear the others, and who scarcely risked an original thought of his own beyond a wish that they had seen his friend Smith's place.

[138]

"Miss Price all alone!" and "My dear Fanny, how comes this?" were the first salutations

After some minutes spent in this way, Miss Bertram, observing the iron gate, expressed a wish of passing through it into the park, that their views and their plans might be more comprehensive. It was the very thing of all others to be wished, it was the best, it was the only way of proceeding with any advantage, in Henry Crawford's opinion, and he directly saw a knoll not half a mile off, which would give them exactly the requisite command of the house. Go therefore they must to that knoll, and through that gate; but the gate was locked. Mr Rushworth wished he had brought the key; he had been very near thinking whether he should not bring the key; he was determined he would never come without the key again; but still this did not remove the present evil. They could not get through; and as Miss Bertram's inclination for so doing did by no means lessen, it ended in Mr Rushworth's declaring outright that he would go and fetch the key. He set off accordingly.

"It is undoubtedly the best thing we can do now, as we are so far from the house already," said Mr Crawford, when he was gone.

"Yes, there is nothing else to be done. But now, sincerely, do not you find the place altogether worse than you expected?"

[139]

"No, indeed, far otherwise. I find it better, grander, more complete in its style, though that style may not be the best. And to tell you the truth," speaking rather lower, "I do not think that I shall ever see Sotherton again with so much pleasure as I do now. Another summer will hardly improve it to me."

After a moment's embarrassment the lady replied, "You are too much a man of the world not to see with the eyes of the world. If other people think Sotherton improved, I have no doubt that you will."

"I am afraid I am not quite so much the man of the world as might be good for me in some points. My feelings are not quite so evanescent, nor my memory of the past under such easy dominion as one finds to be the case with men of the world."

This was followed by a short silence. Miss Bertram began again. "You seemed to enjoy your drive here very much this morning. I was glad to see you so well entertained. You and Julia were laughing the whole way."

"Were we? Yes, I believe we were; but I have not the least recollection at what. Oh! I believe I was relating to her some ridiculous stories of an old Irish groom of my uncle's. Your sister loves to laugh."

[140]

"You think her more light-hearted than I am."

"More easily amused," he replied, "consequently, you know," smiling, "better company. I could not have hoped to entertain you with Irish anecdotes during a ten miles' drive."

"Naturally, I believe, I am as lively as Julia, but I have more to think of now."

"You have, undoubtedly; and there are situations in which very high spirits would denote insensibility. Your prospects, however, are too fair to justify want of spirits. You have a very smiling scene before you."

"Do you mean literally or figuratively? Literally, I conclude. Yes, certainly the sun shines, and the park looks very cheerful. But unluckily that iron gate, that ha-ha, give me a feeling of restraint and hardship. 'I cannot get out,' as the starling said." As she spoke, and it was with expression, she walked to the gate: he followed her. "Mr Rushworth is so long fetching this key!"

"And for the world you would not get out without the key and without Mr Rushworth's authority and protection, or I think you might with little difficulty pass round the edge of the gate, here, with my assistance; I think it might be done, if you really wished to be more at large, and could allow yourself to think it not prohibited."

"Prohibited! nonsense! I certainly can get out that way, and I will. Mr Rushworth will be here in a moment, you know; we shall not be out of sight."

[141]

"Or if we are, Miss Price will be so good as to tell him, that he will find us near that knoll: the grove of oak on the knoll."

Fanny, feeling all this to be wrong, could not help making an effort to prevent it. "You will hurt yourself, Miss Bertram," she cried, "you will certainly hurt yourself against those spikes; you will tear your gown; you will be in danger of slipping into the ha-ha. You had better not go."

Her cousin was safe on the other side, while these words were spoken, and, smiling with all the good humour of success, she said, "Thank you, my dear Fanny, but I and my gown are alive and well, and so good-bye."

Fanny was again left to her solitude, and with no increase of pleasant feelings, for she was sorry for almost all that she had seen and heard, astonished at Miss Bertram, and angry with Mr Crawford. By taking a circuitous route, and, as it appeared to her, very unreasonable direction to the knoll, they were soon beyond her eye; and for some minutes longer she remained without sight or sound of any companion. She seemed to have the little wood all to herself. She could almost have thought that Edmund and Miss Crawford had left it, but that it was impossible for Edmund to forget her so entirely.

[142]

She was again roused from disagreeable musings by sudden footsteps: somebody was coming at a quick pace down the principal walk. She expected Mr Rushworth, but it was Julia, who, hot and out of breath, and with a look of disappointment, cried out on seeing her, "Heyday! Where are the others? I thought Maria and Mr Crawford were with you."

Fanny explained.

"A pretty trick, upon my word! I cannot see them anywhere," looking eagerly into the park. "But they cannot be very far off, and I think I am equal to as much as Maria, even without help."

"But, Julia, Mr Rushworth will be here in a moment with the key. Do wait for Mr Rushworth."

"Not I, indeed. I have had enough of the family for one morning. Why, child, I have but this moment escaped from his horrible mother. Such a penance as I have been enduring, while you were sitting here so composed and so happy! It might have been as well, perhaps, if you had been in my place, but you always contrive to keep out of these scrapes."

This was a most unjust reflection, but Fanny could allow for it, and let it pass: Julia was vexed, and her temper was hasty; but she felt that it would not last, and therefore taking no notice, only asked her if she had not seen Mr Rushworth.

[143]

"Yes, yes, we saw him. He was posting away as if upon life and death, and could but just spare time to tell us his errand, and where you all were."

"It is a pity he should have so much trouble for nothing."

"That is Miss Maria's concern. I am not obliged to punish myself for her sins. The mother I could not avoid, as long as my tiresome aunt was dancing about with the housekeeper, but the son I can get away from."

And she immediately scrambled across the fence, and walked away, not attending to Fanny's last question of whether she had seen anything of Miss Crawford and Edmund. The sort of dread in which Fanny now sat of seeing Mr Rushworth, prevented her thinking so much of their continued absence, however, as she might have done. She felt that he had been very ill used, and was quite unhappy in having to communicate what had passed. He joined her within five minutes after Julia's exit; and though she made the best of the story, he was evidently mortified and displeased in no common degree. At first he scarcely said anything; his looks only expressed his extreme surprise and vexation, and he walked to the gate and stood there, without seeming to know what to do.

"They desired me to stay; my cousin Maria [144] charged me to say that you would find them at that knoll, or thereabouts."

"I do not believe I shall go any further," said he, sullenly; "I see nothing of them. By the time I get to the knoll, they may be gone somewhere else. I have had walking enough."

And he sat down with a most gloomy countenance by Fanny.

"I am very sorry," said she; "it is very unlucky." And she longed to be able to say something more to the purpose.

After an interval of silence, "I think they might as well have staid for me," said he.

"Miss Bertram thought you would follow her."

"I should not have had to follow her if she had staid."

This could not be denied, and Fanny was silenced. After another pause, he went on:---"Pray, Miss Price, are you such a great admirer of this Mr Crawford as some people are? For my part, I can see nothing in him."

"I do not think him at all handsome."

"Handsome! Nobody can call such an undersized man handsome. He is not five foot nine. I should not wonder if he was not more than five foot eight. I think he is an ill-looking fellow. In my opinion, these Crawfords are no addition at all. We did very well without them."

A small sigh escaped Fanny here, and she did not know how to contradict him.

"If I had made any difficulty about fetching the key, there might have been some excuse, but I went the very moment she said she wanted it."

"Nothing could be more obliging than your manner, I am sure, and I dare say you walked as fast as you could; but still it is some distance, you know, from this spot to the house, quite into the house; and when people are waiting, they are bad judges of time, and every half minute seems like five."

He got up and walked to the gate again, and "wished he had had the key about him at the time." Fanny thought she discerned in his standing there an indication of relenting, which encouraged her to another attempt, and she said, therefore, "It is a pity you should not join them. They expected to have a better view of the house from that part of the park, and will be thinking how it may be improved; and nothing of that sort, you know, can be settled without you."

She found herself more successful in sending away, than in retaining a companion. Mr Rushworth was worked on. "Well," said he, "if you really think I had better go: it would be foolish to bring the key for nothing." And letting himself out, he walked off without further ceremony.

Fanny's thoughts were now all engrossed by the two who had left her so long ago, and getting quite impatient, she resolved to go in search of them. She followed their steps along the bottom walk, and had just turned up into another, when the voice and the laugh of Miss Crawford once more caught her ear; the sound approached, and a few more windings brought them before her. They were just returned into the wilderness from the park, to which a side-gate, not fastened, had tempted them very soon after leaving her, and they had been across a portion of the park into the very avenue which Fanny had been hoping the whole morning to reach at last, and had been sitting down under one of the trees. This was their history. It was evident that they had been spending their time pleasantly, and were not aware of the length of their absence. Fanny's best consolation was in being assured that Edmund had wished for her very much, and that he should certainly have come back for her, had she had not been tired already; but this was not quite sufficient to do away with the pain of having been left a whole hour, when he had talked of only a few minutes, nor to banish the sort of curiosity she felt, to know what they had been conversing about all that time; and the result of the whole was to her disappointment and depression, as they prepared by general agreement, to return to the house.

[146]

On reaching the bottom of the steps to the terrace, Mrs Rushworth and Mrs Norris presented themselves at the top, just ready for the wilderness, at the end of an hour and a half from their leaving the house. Mrs Norris had been too well employed to move faster. Whatever cross accidents had occurred to intercept the pleasures of her nieces, she had found a morning of complete enjoyment; for the housekeeper, after a great many courtesies on the subject of pheasants, had taken her to the dairy, told her all about their cows, and given her the receipt for a famous cream cheese; and since Julia's leaving them, they had been met by the gardener, with whom she had made a most satisfactory acquaintance, for she had set him right as to his grandson's illness, convinced him that it was an ague, and promised him a charm for it; and he, in return, had shown her all his choicest nursery of plants, and actually presented her with a very curious specimen of heath.

[147]

On this rencontre they all returned to the house together, there to lounge away the time as they could with sofas, and chit-chat, and Quarterly Reviews, till the return of the others, and the arrival of dinner. It was late before the Miss Bertrams and the two gentlemen came in, and their ramble did not appear to be more than partially agreeable, or at all productive of anything useful with regard to the object of the day. By their own accounts they had been all walking [148] after each other, and the junction which had taken place at last seemed, to Fanny's observation, to have been as much too late for reestablishing harmony, as it confessedly had been for determining on any alteration. She felt, as she looked at Julia and Mr Rushworth, that hers was not the only dissatisfied bosom amongst them; there was gloom on the face of each. Mr Crawford and Miss Bertram were much more gay, and she thought that he was taking particular pains, during dinner, to do away any little resentment of the other two, and restore general good humour.

Dinner was soon followed by tea and coffee, a ten miles' drive home allowed no waste of hours: and from the time of their sitting down to table, it was a quick succession of busy nothings till the carriage came to the door, and Mrs Norris. having fidgeted about, and obtained a few pheasants' eggs and a cream cheese from the housekeeper, and made abundance of civil speeches to Mrs Rushworth, was ready to lead the way. At the same moment, Mr Crawford, approaching Julia, said, "I hope I am not to lose my companion, unless she is afraid of the evening air in so exposed a seat." The request had not been foreseen, but was very graciously received, and Julia's day was likely to end almost as well as it began. Miss Bertram had made up her mind to something different, and was a little disappointed; but her conviction of being really the one preferred, comforted her under it, and enabled her to receive Mr Rushworth's parting attentions as she ought. He was certainly better pleased to hand her into the barouche than to assist her in ascending the box, and his complacency seemed confirmed by the arrangement.

[149]

"Well, Fanny, this has been a fine day for you, upon my word," said Mrs Norris, as they drove through the park. "Nothing but pleasure from beginning to end! I am sure you ought to be very much obliged to your aunt Bertram and me, for contriving to let you go. A pretty good day's amusement you have had!"

Maria was just discontented enough to say directly, "I think you have done pretty well yourself, ma'am. Your lap seems full of good things, and here is a basket of something between us, which has been knocking my elbow unmercifully."

"My dear, it is only a beautiful little heath, which that nice old gardener would make me take; but if it is in your way, I will have it in my lap directly. There, Fanny, you shall carry that parcel for me; take great care of it: do not let it fall; it is a cream cheese, just like the excellent one we had at dinner. Nothing would satisfy that good old Mrs Whitaker, but my taking one [150] of the cheeses. I stood out as long as I could, till the tears almost came into her eyes, and I knew it was just the sort that my sister would be delighted with. That Mrs Whitaker is a treasure! She was quite shocked when I asked her whether wine was allowed at the second table, and she has turned away two housemaids for wearing white gowns. Take care of the cheese, Fanny. Now I can manage the other parcel and the basket very well."

"What else have you been spunging?" said Maria, half pleased that Sotherton should be so complimented.

"Spunging, my dear! It is nothing but four of those beautiful pheasant's eggs, which Mrs Whitaker would quite force upon me; she would not take a denial. She said it must be such an amusement to me, as she understood I lived quite alone, to have a few living creatures of that sort; and so to be sure it will. I shall get the dairymaid to set them under the first spare hen, and if they come to good I can have them moved to my own house and borrow a coop; and it will be a great delight to me in my lonely hours to attend to them. And if I have good luck, your mother shall have some."

It was a beautiful evening, mild and still, and the drive was as pleasant as the serenity of Nature could make it; but when Mrs Norris ceased speaking, it was altogether a silent drive to those within. Their spirits were in general exhausted; and to determine whether the day had afforded most pleasure or pain, might occupy the meditations of almost all.

CHAPTER XI.

THE day at Sotherton, with all its imperfections, afforded the Miss Bertrams much more agreeable feelings than were derived from the letters from Antiqua, which soon afterwards reached Mansfield. It was much pleasanter to think of Henry Crawford than of their father; and to think of their father in England again within a certain period, which these letters obliged them to do, was a most unwelcome exercise.

November was the black month fixed for his return. Sir Thomas wrote of it with as much decision as experience and anxiety could authorize. His business was so nearly concluded as to justify him in proposing to take his passage in the September packet, and he consequently looked forward with the hope of being with his beloved family again early in November.

Maria was more to be pitied than Julia; for to [152]

her the father brought a husband, and the return of the friend most solicitous for her happiness would unite her to the lover, on whom she had chosen that happiness should depend. It was a gloomy prospect, and all she could do was to throw a mist over it, and hope when the mist cleared away she should see something else. It would hardly be early in November, there were generally delays, a bad passage or something; that favouring something which everybody who shuts their eves while they look, or their understandings while they reason, feels the comfort of. It would probably be the middle of November at least: the middle of November was three months off. Three months comprised thirteen weeks. Much might happen in thirteen weeks.

Sir Thomas would have been deeply mortified by a suspicion of half that his daughters felt on the subject of his return, and would hardly have found consolation in a knowledge of the interest it excited in the breast of another young lady. Miss Crawford, on walking up with her brother to spend the evening at Mansfield Park, heard the good news; and though seeming to have no concern in the affair beyond politeness, and to have vented all her feelings in a quiet congratulation, heard it with an attention not so easily satisfied. Mrs Norris gave the particulars of the letters, and the subject was dropt; but after tea, as Miss Crawford was standing at an open window with Edmund and Fanny looking out on a twilight scene, while the Miss Bertrams, Mr Rushworth, and Henry Crawford were all busy with candles at the piano-forte, she suddenly revived it by turning round towards the group, and saying, "How happy Mr Rushworth looks! He is thinking of November."

[153]

Edmund looked round at Mr Rushworth too, but had nothing to say. "Your father's return will be a very interesting event."

"It will, indeed, after such an absence; an absence not only long, but including so many dangers."

"It will be the forerunner also of other interesting events; your sister's marriage, and your taking orders."

"Yes."

"Don't be affronted," said she, laughing, "but it does put me in mind of some of the old heathen heroes, who, after performing great exploits in a foreign land, offered sacrifices to the gods on their safe return."

"There is no sacrifice in the case," replied Edmund, with a serious smile, and glancing at the piano-forte again, "it is entirely her own doing."

"Oh yes! I know it is. I was merely joking. [154] She has done no more than what every young woman would do; and I have no doubt of her being extremely happy. My other sacrifice of course you do not understand."

"My taking orders, I assure you, is quite as voluntary as Maria's marrying."

"It is fortunate that your inclination and your father's convenience should accord so well. There is a very good living kept for you, I understand, hereabouts."

"Which you suppose has biassed me?"

"But that I am sure it has not," cried Fanny.

"Thank you for your good word, Fanny, but it is more than I would affirm myself. On the contrary, the knowing that there was such a provision for me probably did bias me. Nor can I think it wrong that it should. There was no natural disinclination to be overcome, and I see no reason why a man should make a worse clergyman for knowing that he will have a competence early in life. I was in safe hands. I hope I should not have been influenced myself in a wrong way, and I am sure my father was too conscientious to have allowed it. I have no doubt that I was biassed, but I think it was blamelessly."

"It is the same sort of thing," said Fanny, after a short pause, "as for the son of an admiral to go into the navy or the son of a general to be in the army, and nobody sees anything wrong in that. Nobody wonders that they should prefer the line where their friends can serve them best. or suspects them to be less in earnest in it than they appear."

[155]

"No, my dear Miss Price, and for reasons good. The profession, either navy or army, is its own justification. It has everything in its favour; heroism, danger, bustle, fashion. Soldiers and sailors are always acceptable in society. Nobody can wonder that men are soldiers and sailors."

"But the motives of a man who takes orders with the certainty of preferment may be fairly suspected you think?" said Edmund. "To be justified in your eyes, he must do it in the most complete uncertainty of any provision."

"What! take orders without a living! No; that is madness indeed; absolute madness."

"Shall I ask you how the church is to be filled, if a man is neither to take orders with a living, nor without? No; for you certainly would not know what to say. But I must beg some advantage to the clergyman from your own argument. As he cannot be influenced by those feelings which you rank highly as temptation and reward to the soldier and sailor, in their choice of a profession, as heroism, and noise, and fashion, are all against him, he ought to be less liable to the suspicion of wanting sincerity or good intentions in the choice of his."

[156]

"Oh! no doubt he is very sincere in preferring an income ready made, to the trouble of working for one: and has the best intentions of doing nothing all the rest of his days but eat, drink, and grow fat. It is indolence, Mr Bertram, indeed. Indolence and love of ease; a want of all laudable ambition, of taste for good company, or of inclination to take the trouble of being agreeable, which make men clergymen. A clergyman has nothing to do but be slovenly and selfish; read the newspaper, watch the weather, and quarrel with his wife. His curate does all the work, and the business of his own life is to dine."

"There are such clergymen, no doubt, but I think they are not so common as to justify Miss Crawford in esteeming it their general character. I suspect that in this comprehensive and (may I say) commonplace censure, you are not judging from yourself, but from prejudiced persons, whose opinions you have been in the habit of hearing. It is impossible that your own observation can have given you much knowledge of the clergy. You can have been personally acquainted with very few of a set of men you condemn so conclusively. You are speaking what you have been told at your uncle's table." "I speak what appears to me the general opinion; and where an opinion is general, it is usually correct. Though I have not seen much of the domestic lives of clergymen, it is seen by too many to leave any deficiency of information."

[157]

"Where any one body of educated men, of whatever denomination, are condemned indiscriminately, there must be a deficiency of information, or (smiling) of something else. Your uncle, and his brother admirals, perhaps knew little of clergymen beyond the chaplains whom, good or bad, they were always wishing away."

"Poor William! He has met with great kindness from the chaplain of the Antwerp," was a tender apostrophe of Fanny's, very much to the purpose of her own feelings if not of the conversation.

"I have been so little addicted to take my opinions from my uncle," said Miss Crawford, "that I can hardly suppose—and since you push me so hard, I must observe, that I am entirely without the means of seeing what clergymen are, being at this present time the guest of my own brother, Dr Grant. And though Dr Grant is most kind and obliging to me, and though he is really a gentleman, and, I dare say, a good scholar and clever, and often preaches good sermons, and is very respectable, I see him to be an indolent, selfish bon vivant, who must have his palate consulted in everything; who will not stir a finger for the convenience of any one; and who, moreover, if the cook makes a blunder, is out of humour with his excellent wife. To own the truth, Henry and I were partly driven out this very evening by a disappointment about a green goose, which he could not get the better of. My poor sister was forced to stay and bear it."

[158]

"I do not wonder at your disapprobation, upon my word. It is a great defect of temper, made worse by a very faulty habit of self-indulgence; and to see your sister suffering from it must be exceedingly painful to such feelings as yours. Fanny, it goes against us. We cannot attempt to defend Dr Grant."

"No," replied Fanny, "but we need not give up his profession for all that; because, whatever profession Dr Grant had chosen, he would have taken a—not a good temper into it; and as he must, either in the navy or army have had a great many more people under his command than he has now, I think more would have been made unhappy by him as a sailor or soldier than as a clergyman. Besides, I cannot but suppose that whatever there may be to wish otherwise in Dr Grant, would have been in a greater danger of becoming worse in a more active and worldly profession, where he would have had less time and obligation—where he might have escaped that knowledge of himself. the frequency, at least, of that knowledge which it is impossible he should escape as he is now. A man—a sensible man like Dr Grant, cannot be in the habit of teaching others their duty every week, cannot go to church twice every Sunday, and preach such very good sermons in so good a manner as he does, without being the better for it himself. It must make him think; and I have no doubt that he oftener endeavours to restrain himself than he would if he had been anything but a clergyman."

[159]

"We cannot prove to the contrary, to be sure; but I wish you a better fate, Miss Price, than to be the wife of a man whose amiableness depends upon his own sermons; for, though he may preach himself into a good humour every Sunday, it will be bad enough to have him quarreling about green geese from Monday morning till Saturday night."

"I think the man who could often quarrel with Fanny," said Edmund, affectionately, "must be beyond the reach of any sermons."

Fanny turned farther into the window; and Miss Crawford had only time to say, in a pleasant manner, "I fancy Miss Price has been more used to deserve praise than to hear it;" when being earnestly invited by the Miss Bertrams to join in a glee, she tripped off to the instrument, leaving Edmund looking after her in an ecstasy of admiration of all her many virtues, from her obliging manners down to her light and graceful tread.

[160]

"There goes good humour, I am sure," said he presently. "There goes a temper which would never give pain! How well she walks! and how readily she falls in with the inclination of others! joining them the moment she is asked. What a pity," he added, after an instant's reflection, "that she should have been in such hands!"

Fanny agreed to it, and had the pleasure of seeing him continue at the window with her, in spite of the expected glee; and of having his eyes soon turned, like hers, towards the scene without, where all that was solemn, and soothing, and lovely, appeared in the brilliancy of an unclouded night, and the contrast of the deep shade of the woods. Fanny spoke her feelings. "Here's harmony!" said she; "here's repose! Here's what may leave all painting and all music behind, and what poetry only can attempt to describe! Here's what may tranquillize every care, and lift the heart to rapture! When I look out on such a night as this, I feel as if there could be neither wickedness nor scrrow in the world; and there certainly would be less of both if the sublimity of Nature were more attended to, and people were carried more out of themselves by contemplating such a scene."

"I like to hear your enthusiasm, Fanny. It is a lovely night, and they are much to be pitied who have not been taught to feel, in some degree, as you do; who have not, at least, been given a taste for Nature in early life. They lose a great deal."

[161]

"You taught me to think and feel on the subject, cousin."

"I had a very apt scholar. There's Arcturus looking very bright."

"Yes, and the Bear. I wish I could see Cassiopeia."

"We must go out on the lawn for that. Should you be afraid?"

"Not in the least. It is a great while since we have had any star-gazing."

"Yes; I do not know how it has happened." The glee began. "We will stay till this is finished, Fanny," said he, turning his back on the window; and as it advanced, she had the mortification of seeing him advance too, moving forward by gentle degrees towards the instrument, and when it ceased, he was close by the singers, among the most urgent in requesting to hear the glee again.

Fanny sighed alone at the window till scolded away by Mrs Norris's threats of catching cold.

CHAPTER XII.

SIR THOMAS was to return in November, and his eldest son had duties to call him earlier home. The approach of September brought tidings of Mr Bertram, first in a letter to the gamekeeper and then in a letter to Edmund; and by the end of August he arrived himself, to be gay, agreeable, and gallant again as occasion served, or Miss Crawford demanded; to tell of races and Weymouth, and parties and friends, to which she might have listened six weeks before with some interest, and altogether to give her the fullest conviction, by the power of actual comparison, of her preferring his younger brother.

It was very vexatious, and she was heartily sorry for it; but so it was; and so far from now meaning to marry the elder, she did not even want to attract him beyond what the simplest claims of conscious beauty required: his lengthened absence from Mansfield, without anything but pleasure in view, and his own will to consult, made it perfectly clear that he did not care about her; and his indifference was so much more than equalled by her own, that were he now to step forth the owner of Mansfield Park, the Sir Thomas complete, which he was to be in time, she did not believe she could accept him.

The season and duties which brought Mr Bertram back to Mansfield took Mr Crawford into Norfolk. Everingham could not do without him in the beginning of September. He went for a fortnight-a fortnight of such dulness to the Miss Bertrams as ought to have put them both on their guard, and made even Julia admit, in her jealousy of her sister, the absolute necessity of distrusting his attentions, and wishing him not to return; and a fortnight of sufficient leisure, in the intervals of shooting and sleeping to have convinced the gentleman that he ought to keep longer away, had he been more in the habit of examining his own motives, and of reflecting to what the indulgence of his idle vanity was tending; but, thoughtless and selfish from prosperity and bad example, he would not look beyond the present moment. The sisters, handsome, clever, and encouraging, were an amusement to his sated mind; and finding nothing in Norfolk to equal the social pleasures of Mansfield, he gladly returned to it at the time appointed, and was welcomed thither quite as gladly by those whom he came to trifle with farther.

Maria, with only Mr Rushworth to attend to her, and doomed to the repeated details of his day's sport, good or bad, his boast of his dogs, his jealousy of his neighbours, his doubts of their qualifications, and his zeal after poachers, subjects which will not find their way to female feelings without some talent on one side or some attachment on the other, had missed Mr Crawford grievously; and Julia, unengaged and unemployed, felt all the right of missing him much more. Each sister believed herself the favourite. Julia might be justified in so doing by the hints of Mrs Grant, inclined to credit what she wished, and Maria by the hints of Mr Crawford himself. Everything returned into the same channel as before his absence; his manners being to each so animated and agreeable as to lose no ground with either, and just stopping short of the consistence, the steadiness, the solicitude, and the warmth which might excite general notice.

[164]

Fanny was the only one of the party who found anything to dislike; but since the day at Sotherton, she could never see Mr Crawford with either sister without observation, and seldom without wonder or censure; and had her confidence in her own judgment been equal to her exercise of it in every other respect, had she been sure that she was seeing clearly, and judging candidly, she would probably have made some important communications to her usual confidant. As it was, however, she only hazarded a hint, and the hint was lost. "I am rather surprised," said she, "that Mr Crawford should come back again so soon, after being here so long before, full seven weeks; for I had understood he was so very fond of change and moving about, that I thought something would certainly occur when he was once gone, to take him elsewhere. He is used to much gayer places than Mansfield."

[165]

"It is to his credit," was Edmund's answer; "and I dare say it gives his sister pleasure. She does not like his unsettled habits."

"What a favourite he is with my cousins!"

"Yes, his manners to women are such as must please. Mrs Grant, I believe, suspects him of a preference for Julia; I have never seen much symptom of it, but I wish it may be so. He has no faults but what a serious attachment would remove."

"If Miss Bertram were not engaged," said Fanny, cautiously, "I could almost think that he admired her more than Julia."

"Which is, perhaps, more in favour of his liking Julia best, than you, Fanny, may be aware; for I believe it often happens, that a man, before he has quite made up his own mind, will distinguish the sister or intimate friend of the woman he is really thinking of, more than the woman herself. Crawford has too much sense to stay here if he found himself in any danger from Maria; and I am not at all afraid for her, after such a proof as she has given, that her feelings are not strong."

[166]

Fanny supposed she must have been mistaken, and meant to think differently in future; but with all that submission to Edmund could do. and all the help of the coinciding looks and hints which she occasionally noticed in some of the others, and which seemed to say that Julia was Mr Crawford's choice, she knew not always what to think. She was privy, one evening, to the hopes of her aunt Norris on the subject, as well as to her feelings, and the feelings of Mrs Rushworth, on a point of some similarity, and could not help wondering as she listened; and glad would she have been not to be obliged to listen, for it was while all the other young people were dancing, and she sitting, most unwillingly, among the chaperons at the fire, longing for the re-entrance of her elder cousin, on whom all her own hopes of a partner then depended. It was Fanny's first ball, though without the preparation or splendour of many a young lady's first ball, being the thought only of the afternoon, built on the late acquisition of a violin player in the servants' hall, and the possibility of raising five couple with the help of Mrs Grant and a new intimate friend of Mr Bertram's just arrived on a visit. It had, however, been a very happy one to Fanny through four dances, and she was quite grieved to be losing even a quarter of an hour. While waiting and wishing, looking now at the dancers and now at the door, this dialogue between the two above-mentioned ladies was forced on her—

[167]

"I think, ma'am," said Mrs Norris—her eyes directed towards Mr Rushworth and Maria, who were partners for the second time, "we shall see some happy faces again now."

"Yes ma'am, indeed," replied the other, with a stately simper, "there will be some satisfaction in looking on now, and I think it was rather a pity they should have been obliged to part. Young folks in their situation should be excused complying with the common forms. I wonder my son did not propose it."

"I dare say he did, ma'am. Mr Rushworth is never remiss. But dear Maria has such a strict sense of propriety, so much of that true delicacy which one seldom meets with now-a-days, Mrs Rushworth—that wish of avoiding particularity! Dear ma'am, only look at her face at this moment; how different from what it was the two last dances!"

Miss Bertram did indeed look happy, her eyes were sparkling with pleasure, and she was speaking with great animation, for Julia and her partner, Mr Crawford, were close to her; they were all in a cluster together. How she had looked before, Fanny could not recollect, for she had been dancing with Edmund herself, and had not thought about her.

[168]

Mrs Norris continued, "It is quite delightful, ma'am, to see young people so properly happy, oo well suited, and so much the thing! I cannot but think of dear Sir Thomas's delight. And what do you say, ma'am, to the chance of another match? Mr Rushworth has set a good example, and such things are very catching."

Mrs Rushworth, who saw nothing but her son, was quite at a loss. "The couple above, ma'am. Do you see no symptoms there?"

"Oh dear? Miss Julia and Mr Crawford. Yes, indeed, a very pretty match. What is his property?"

"Four thousand a-year."

"Very well. Those who have not more, must be satisfied with what they have. Four thousand a year is a pretty estate, and he seems a very genteel, steady young man, so I hope Miss Julia will be very happy."

"It is not a settled thing, ma'am, yet. We only speak of it among friends. But I have very little doubt it will be. He is growing extremely particular in his attentions."

Fanny could listen no farther. Listening and wondering were all suspended for a time, for Mr Bertram was in the room again; and though feeling it would be a great honour to be asked by him, she thought it must happen. He came towards their little circle; but instead of asking her to dance, drew a chair near her, and gave her an account of the present state of a sick horse, and the opinion of the groom, from whom he had just parted. Fanny found that it was not to be, and in the modesty of her nature immediately felt that she had been unreasonable in expecting it. When he had told of his horse, he took a newspaper from the table, and looking over it, said in a languid way, "If you want to dance, Fanny, I will stand up with you." With more than equal civility the offer was declined; she did not wish to dance. "I am glad of it," said he, in a much brisker tone, and throwing down the newspaper again, "for I am tired to death. I only wonder how the good people can keep it up so long. They had need be all in love, to find any amusement in such folly; and so they are I fancy. If you look at them you may see they are so many couple of lovers-all but Yates and Mrs Grantand, between ourselves, she, poor woman, must want a lover as much as any one of them. A desperate dull life hers must be with the doctor," making a sly face as he spoke towards the chair of the latter, who proving, however, to be close at his elbow, made so instantaneous a change of expression and subject necessary, as Fanny, in spite of everything, could hardly help laughing at. "A strange business this in America, Dr Grant! What is your opinion? I always come [170] to you to know what I am to think of public matters."

[169]

"My dear Tom," cried his aunt soon afterwards, "as you are not dancing, I dare say you will have no objection to join us in a rubber; shall you?" Then leaving her seat, and coming to him to enforce the proposal, added in a whisper, "We want to make a table for Mrs Rushworth, you know. Your mother is quite anxious about it, but cannot very well spare time to sit down herself, because of her fringe. Now, you, and I, and Dr Grant, will just do; and though we play but half-crowns, you know, you may bet halfguineas with him."

"I should be most happy," replied he aloud, and jumping up with alacrity, "it would give me the greatest pleasure; but that I am this moment going to dance. Come, Fanny," taking her hand, "do not be dawdling any longer, or the dance will be over."

Fanny was led off very willingly, though it was impossible for her to feel much gratitude towards her cousin, or distinguish, as he certainly did, between the selfishness of another person and his own.

"A pretty modest request upon my word," he indignantly exclaimed as they walked away. "To want to nail me to a card table for the next two hours with herself and Dr Grant, who are always quarrelling, and that poking old woman, who knows no more of whist than of algebra. I wish my good aunt would be a little less busy! And to ask me in such a way too! without ceremony, before them all, so as to leave me no possibility of refusing. That is what I dislike most particularly. It raises my spleen more than anything, to have the pretence of being asked, of being given a choice, and at the same time addressed in such a way as to oblige one to do the very thing, whatever it be! If I had not luckily thought of standing up with you I could not have got out of it. It is a great deal too bad. But when my aunt has got a fancy in her head, nothing can stop her."

[171]

CHAPTER XIII.

THE Honourable John Yates, this new friend, had not much to recommend him beyond habits of fashion and expense, and being the younger son of a lord with a tolerable independence; and Sir Thomas would probably have thought his introduction at Mansfield by no means desirable. Mr Bertram's acquaintance with him had begun at Weymouth, where they had spent ten days together in the [172] same society, and the friendship, if friendship it might be called, had been proved and perfected by Mr Yates's being invited to take Mansfield in his way, whenever he could, and by his promising to come; and he did come rather earlier than had been expected, in consequence of the sudden breaking-up of a large party assembled for gaiety at the house of another friend, which he had left Weymouth to join. He came on the wings of disappointment, and with his head full of acting, for it had been a theatrical party; and the play in which he had borne a part, was within two days of representation, when the sudden death of one of the nearest connections of the family had destroyed the scheme and dispersed the performers. To be so near happiness, so near fame, so near the long paragraph in praise of the private theatricals at Ecclesford, the seat of the Right Hon. Lord Ravenshaw, in Cornwall, which would of course have immortalized the whole party for at least a twelve-month! and being so near, to lose it all, was an injury to be keenly felt, and Mr Yates could talk of nothing else. Ecclesford and its theatre, with its arrangements and dresses, rehearsals, and jokes, was his never-failing subject, and to boast of the past his only consolation.

Happily for him, a love of the theatre is so general, an itch for acting so strong among young people, that he could hardly out-talk the interest of his hearers. From the first casting of the parts, to the epilogue, it was all bewitching, and there were few who did not wish to have been a party concerned, or would have hesitated to try their skill. The play had been Lovers' Vows, and Mr Yates was to have been Count Cassel. "A triffing part," said he, "and not at all to my taste, and such a one as I certainly would not accept again; but I was determined to make no difficulties. Lord Ravenshaw and the duke had appropriated the only two characters worth playing before I reached Ecclesford, and though Lord Ravenshaw offered to resign his to me, it was impossible to take it, you know. I was sorry for him that he should have so mistaken his powers, for he was no more equal to the Baron-a little man with a weak voice, always hoarse after the first ten minutes. It must have injured the piece materially; but I was resolved to make no difficulties. Sir Henry thought the duke not equal to Frederick, but that was because Sir Henry wanted the part himself; whereas it was certainly in the best hands of the two. I was surprised to see Sir Henry such a stick. Luckily the strength of the piece did not depend upon him. Our Agatha was inimitable, and the duke was thought very great by many. And upon the whole, it would certainly have gone off wonderfully."

[173]

[174]

1

"It was a hard case, upon my word;" and, "I do think you were very much to be pitied," were the kind responses of listening sympathy.

"It is not worth complaining about; but to be sure the poor old dowager could not have died at a worse time; and it is impossible to help wishing that the news could have been suppressed for just the three days we wanted. It was but three days; and being only a grandmother, and all happening two hundred miles off, I think there would have been no great harm, and it was suggested, I know; but Lord Ravenshaw, who I suppose is one of the most correct men in England, would not hear of it."

"An afterpiece instead of a comedy," said Mr Bertram. "Lovers' Vows were at an end, and Lord and Lady Ravenshaw left to act My Grandmother by themselves. Well, the jointure may comfort him; and, perhaps, between friends, he began to tremble for his credit and his lungs in the Baron, and was not sorry to withdraw; and to make you amends, Yates, I think we must raise a little theatre at Mansfield, and ask you to be our manager."

This, though the thought of the moment, did not end with the moment; for the inclination to act was awakened, and in no one more strongly than in him who was now master of the house; and who having so much leisure as to make almost any novelty a certain good, had likewise such a degree of lively talents and comic taste, as were exactly adapted to the novelty of acting. The thought returned again and again. "Oh, for the Ecclesford theatre and scenery to try something with!" Each sister could echo the wish; and Henry Crawford, to whom, in all the riot of his gratifications it was yet an untasted pleasure, was quite alive at the idea. "I really believe," said he, "I could be fool enough at this moment to undertake any character that ever was written, from Shylock or Richard III. down to the singing hero of a farce in his scarlet coat and cocked hat. I feel as if I could be anything or everything; as if I could rant and storm, or sigh, or cut capers in any tragedy or comedy in the English language. Let us be doing something. Be it only half a play, an act, a scene; what should prevent us? Not these countenances, I am sure," looking towards the Miss Bertrams, "and for a theatre, what signifies a theatre? We shall be only amusing ourselves. Any room in this house might suffice."

[175]

"We must have a curtain," said Tom Bertram; "a few yards of green baize for a curtain, and perhaps that may be enough."

"Oh, quite enough!" cried Mr Yates, "with only just a side wing or two run up, doors in flat, and three or four scenes to be let down; nothing more would be necessary on such a plan as this. For mere amusement among ourselves, we should want nothing more."

[176]

"I believe we must be satisfied with less," said Maria. "There would not be time, and other difficulties would arise. We must rather adopt Mr Crawford's views, and make the performance, not the theatre, our object. Many parts of our best plays are independent of scenery."

"Nay," said Edmund, who began to listen with alarm. "Let us do nothing by halves. If we are to act, let it be in a theatre completely fitted up with pit, boxes, and gallery, and let us have a play entire from beginning to end; so as it be a German play, no matter what, with a good tricking, shifting afterpiece, and a figure-dance, and a hornpipe, and a song between the acts. If we do not outdo Ecclesford, we do nothing."

"Now, Edmund, do not be disagreeable," said Julia. "Nobody loves a play better than you do, or can have gone much farther to see one."

"True, to see real acting, good hardened real acting; but I would hardly walk from this room to the next to look at the raw efforts of those who have not been bred to the trade; a set of gentlemen and ladies, who have all the disadvantages of education and decorum to struggle through."

After a short pause, however, the subject still continued, and was discussed with unabated eagerness, every one's inclination increasing by the discussion, and a knowledge of the inclination of the rest; and though nothing was settled but that Tom Bertram would prefer a comedy, and his sisters and Henry Crawford a tragedy, and that nothing in the world could be easier than to find a piece which would please them all, the resolution to act something or other seemed so decided, as to make Edmund quite uncomfortable. He was determined to prevent it, if possible, though his mother, who equally heard the conversation which passed at table, did not evince the least disapprobation.

The same evening afforded him an opportunity of trying his strength. Maria, Julia, Henry Crawford, and Mr Yates, were in the billiard-room. Tom returning from them into the drawing-room, where Edmund was standing thoughtfully by the fire, while Lady Bertram was on the sofa at a little distance, and Fanny close beside her, arranging her work, thus began as he entered-

"Such a horribly vile billiard-table as ours is not to be met with, I believe, above ground. I can stand it no longer, and I think, I may say, that nothing shall ever tempt me to it again; but one good thing I have just ascertained: it is the very room for a theatre, precisely the shape and length for it; and the doors at the farther end, communicating with each other, as they may be made to do in five minutes, by merely moving the bookcase in my father's room, is the very thing we could have desired, if we had set down to wish for it; and my father's room will be an excellent green room. It seems to join the billiard-room on purpose."

[178]

"You are not serious, Tom, in meaning to act?" said Edmund, in a low voice, as his brother approached the fire.

"Not serious! never more so, I assure you. What is there to surprise you in it?"

"I think it would be very wrong. In a general light, private theatricals are open to some objections, but as we are circumstanced, I must think it would be highly injudicious, and more than injudicious, to attempt anything of the kind. It would show great want of feeling on my father's account, absent as he is, and in some degree of constant danger; and it would be imprudent, I think, with regard to Maria, whose situation is a very delicate one, considering everything, extremely delicate."

"You take up a thing so seriously! as if we were going to act three times a week till my father's return, and invite all the country. But it is not to be a display of that sort. We mean nothing but a little amusement among ourselves, just to vary the scene, and exercise our powers in something new. We want no audience, no publicity. We may be trusted, I think, in choosing some play most perfectly unexceptionable; and I can conceive no greater harm or danger to any of us in conversing in the elegant written language of some respectable author than in chattering in words of our own. I have no fears, and no scruples. And as to my father's being absent, it is so far from an objection, that I consider it rather as a motive; for the expectation of his return must be a very anxious period to my mother; and if we can be the means of amusing that anxiety, and keeping up her spirits for the next few weeks, I shall think our time very well spent, and so, I am sure, will he. It is a very anxious period for her."

[179]

As he said this, each looked towards their mother. Lady Bertram, sunk back in one corner of the sofa, the picture of health, wealth, ease and tranquillity, was just falling into a gentle doze, while Fanny was getting through the few difficulties of her work for her.

Edmund smiled and shook his head.

"By Jove! this won't do," cried Tom, throwing himself into a chair with a hearty laugh. "To be sure, my dear mother, your anxiety—I was unlucky there."

"What is the matter?" asked her ladyship, in [180]

the heavy tone of one half roused, "I was not asleep."

"Oh dear no, ma'am, nobody suspected you! Well, Edmund," he continued, returning to the former subject, posture, and voice, as soon as Lady Bertram began to nod again, "but this I will maintain, that we shall be doing no harm."

"I cannot agree with you; I am convinced that my father would totally disapprove it."

"And I am convinced to the contrary. Nobody is fonder of the exercise of talent in young people, or promotes it more, than my father, and for anything of the acting, spouting, reciting kind, I think he has always a decided taste. I am sure he encouraged it in us as boys. How many a time have we mourned over the dead body of Julius Cæsar, and to be'd and not to be'd, in this very room, for his amusement? And I am sure, my name was Norval, every evening of my life through one Christmas holidays."

"It was a very different thing. You must see the difference yourself. My father wished us, as school-boys, to speak well, but he would never wish his grown-up daughters to be acting plays. His sense of decorum is strict."

"I know all that," said Tom, displeased. "I know my father as well as you do; and I'll take care that his daughters do nothing to distress him. Manage your own concerns, Edmund, and I'll take care of the rest of the family."

[181]

"If you are resolved on acting," replied the persevering Edmund, "I must hope it will be in a very small and quiet way; and I think a theatre ought not to be attempted. It would be taking liberties with my father's house in his absence which could not be justified."

"For every thing of that nature, I will be answerable," said Tom, in a decided tone. "His house shall not be hurt. I have quite as great an interest in being careful of his house as you can have; and as to such alterations as I was suggesting just now, such as moving a bookcase, or unlocking a door; or even as using the billiardroom for the space of a week without playing at billiards in it, you might just as well suppose he would object to our sitting more in this room, and less in the breakfast-room, than we did before he went away, or to my sister's piano-forte being moved from one side of the room to the other. Absolute nonsense!"

"The innovation, if not wrong as an innovation, will be wrong as an expense."

"Yes, the expense of such an undertaking would be prodigious! Perhaps it might cost a whole twenty pounds. Something of a theatre we must have undoubtedly, but it will be on the simplest plan; a green curtain and a little carpenter's work, and that's all; and as the carpenter's work may be all done at home by Christo-[182] pher Jackson himself, it will be too absurd to talk of expense; and as long as Jackson is employed, every thing will be right with Sir Thomas. Don't imagine that nobody in this house can see or judge but yourself. Don't act yourself, if you do not like it, but don't expect to govern everybody else."

"No, as to acting myself," said Edmund, "that I absolutely protest against."

Tom walked out of the room as he said it, and Edmund was left to sit down and stir the fire in thoughtful vexation.

Fanny, who had heard it all, and borne Edmund company in every feeling throughout the whole, now ventured to say, in her anxiety to suggest some comfort, "Perhaps they may not be able to find any play to suit them. Your brother's taste, and your sisters' seem very different."

"I have no hope there, Fanny. If they persist in the scheme, they will find something. I shall speak to my sisters and try to dissuade them, and that is all I can do."

"I should think my aunt Norris would be on your side."

"I dare say she would, but she has no influence with either Tom or my sisters that could be of any use; and if I cannot convince them myself, I shall let things take their course, without attempting it through her. Family squabbling is [183] the greatest evil of all, and we had better do anything than be altogether by the ears."

His sisters, to whom he had an opportunity of speaking the next morning, were quite as impatient of his advice, quite as unyielding to his representation, quite as determined in the cause of pleasure, as Tom. Their mother had no objection to the plan, and they were not in the least afraid of their father's disapprobation. There could be no harm in what had been done in so many respectable families, and by so many women of the first consideration; and it must be scrupulousness run mad, that could see anything to censure in a plan like theirs, comprehending only brothers and sisters, and intimate friends, and which would never be heard of beyond themselves. Julia did seem inclined to admit that Maria's situation might require particular caution and delicacy-but that could not extend to her-she was at liberty; and Maria evidently considered her engagement as only raising her so much more above restraint, and leaving her less occasion than Julia, to consult either father or mother. Edmund had little to hope, but he was still urging the subject, when Henry Crawford entered the room, fresh from the Parsonage, calling out, "No want of hands in our theatre, Miss Bertram. No want of understrappers; my sister desires her love, and hopes to be admitted into the company, and will be happy to take the part of any old duenna, or tame confidante, that you may not like to do yourselves."

[184]

"Maria gave Edmund a glance, which meant, "What say you now? Can we be wrong if Mary Crawford feels the same?" And Edmund, silenced, was obliged to acknowledge that the charm of acting might well carry fascination to the mind of genius; and with the ingenuity of love, to dwell more on the obliging, accomodating purport of the message than on anything else.

The scheme advanced. Opposition was vain; and as to Mrs Norris, he was mistaken in supposing she would wish to make any. She started no difficulties that were not talked down in five minutes by her eldest nephew and niece, who were all-powerful with her; and, as the whole arrangement was to bring very little expense to anybody, and none at all to herself, as she foresaw in it all the comforts of hurry, bustle, and importance, and derived the immediate advantage of fancying herself obliged to leave her own house, where she had been living a month at her own cost, and take up her abode in theirs, that every hour might be spent in their service, she was, in fact, exceedingly delighted with the project.

CHAPTER XIV.

ANNY seemed nearer being right than Edmund had supposed. The business of finding a play that would suit everybody proved to be no trifle; and the carpenter had received his orders and taken his measurements, had suggested and removed at least two sets of difficulties, and having made the necessity of an enlargement of plan and expense fully evident, was already at work, while a play was still to seek. Other preparations were also in hand. An enormous roll of green baize had arrived from Northampton, and been cut out by Mrs Norris (with a saving by her good management, of full three quarters of a yard), and was actually forming into a curtain by the housemaids, and still the play was wanting; and as two or three days passed away in this manner, Edmund began almost to hope that none might ever be found.

There were, in fact, so many things to be attended to, so many people to be pleased, so many best characters required, and above all, such a need that the play should be at once both tragedy and comedy, that there did seem as little chance of a decision as anything pursued by youth and zeal could hold out.

On the tragic side were the Miss Bertrams, [186] Henry Crawford and Mr Yates; on the comic, Tom Bertram, not quite alone, because it was evident that Mary Crawford's wishes, though politely kept back, inclined the same way: but his determinateness and his power seemed to make allies unnecessary; and, independent of this great irreconcileable difference, they wanted a piece containing very few characters in the whole, but every character first-rate, and three principal women. All the best plays were run over in vain. Neither Hamlet, nor Macbeth, nor Othello, nor Douglas, nor the Gamester, presented anything that could satisfy even the tragedians; and the Rivals, the School for Scandal, Wheel of Fortune, Heir at Law, and a long et cetera, were successively dismissed with yet warmer objections. No piece could be proposed that did not supply somebody with a difficulty, and on one side or the other it was a continual repetition of, "Oh no, that will never do! Let us have no ranting tragedies. Too many characters. Not a tolerable woman's part in the play. Anything but that, my dear Tom. It would be impossible to fill it up. One could not expect anybody to take such a part. Nothing but buffoonery from beginning to end. That might do, perhaps, but for the low parts. If I must give my opinion, I have always thought it the most insipid play in the English language. I do not wish to make objections; I shall be happy to be of any use, but I think we could not choose worse."

[187]

Fanny looked on and listened, not amused to observe the selfishness which, more or less disguised, seemed to govern them all, and wondering how it would end. For her own gratification she could have wished that something might be acted, for she had never seen even half a play, but everything of higher consequence was against it.

"This will never do," said Tom Bertram at last. "We are wasting time most abominably. Something must be fixed on. No matter what, so that something is chosen. We must not be so nice. A few characters too many must not frighten us. We must double them. We must descend a little. If a part is insignificant, the greater our credit in making anything of it. From this moment I make no difficulties. I take any part you choose to give me, so as it be comic. Let it but be comic, I condition for nothing more."

For about the fifth time he then proposed the Heir at Law, doubting only whether to prefer Lord Duberley or Dr Pangloss for himself; and very earnestly, but very unsuccessfully, trying to persuade the others that there were some fine tragic parts in the rest of the dramatis personæ.

The pause which followed this fruitless effort was ended by the same speaker, who taking up one of the many volumes of plays that lay on the table, and turning it over, suddenly exclaimed,— "Lovers' Vows! And why should not Lovers' Vows do for us as well as for the Ravenshaws? How came it never to be thought of before? It strikes me as if it would do exactly. What say you all? Here are two capital tragic parts for Yates and Crawford, and here is the rhyming Butler for me, if nobody else wants it; a trifling part, but the sort of thing I should not dislike, and, as I said before, I am determined to take anything and do my best. And as for the rest, they may be filled up by anybody. It is only Count Cassel and Anhalt."

[188]

The suggestion was generally welcome. Everybody was growing weary of indecision, and the first idea with everybody was, that nothing had been proposed before so likely to suit them all. Mr Yates was particularly pleased: he had been sighing and longing to do the Baron at Ecclesford, had grudged every rant of Lord Ravenshaw's and been forced to re-rant it all in his own room. The storm through Baron [Wildenheim] was the height of his theatrical ambition; and with the advantage of knowing half the scenes by heart already, he did now with the greatest alacrity, offer his services for the part. To do him justice, however, he did not resolve to appropriate it; for remembering that there was some good ranting ground in Frederick, he professed an equal willingness for that. Henry Crawford was ready to take either. Whichever Mr Yates did not choose would perfectly satisfy him, and a short parley of compliment ensued. Miss Bertram, feeling all the interest of an Agatha in the question, took on her to decide it, by observing to Mr Yates, that this was a point in which height and figure ought to be considered, and that his being the tallest, seemed to fit him peculiarly for the Baron. She was acknowledged to be quite right, and the two parts being accepted accordingly, she was certain of the proper Frederick. Three of the characters were now cast, besides Mr Rushworth, who was always answered for by Maria as willing to do anything; when Julia, meaning, like her sister, to be Agatha, began to be scrupulous on Miss Crawford's account.

[189]

"This is not behaving well by the absent," said she. "Here are not women enough. Amelia and Agatha may do for Maria and me, but here is nothing for your sister, Mr Crawford."

Mr Crawford desired that might not be thought of: he was very sure his sister had no wish of acting, but as she might be useful, and that she would not allow herself to be considered in the present case. But this was immediately opposed by Tom Bertram, who asserted the part of Amelia to be in every respect the property of Miss Crawford, if she would accept it. "It falls as naturally, as necessarily to her," said he, "as Agatha does to one or other of my sisters. It can be no sacrifice on their side, for it is highly comic."

[190]

A short silence followed. Each sister looked anxious; for each felt the best claim to Agatha, and was hoping to have it pressed on her by the rest. Henry Crawford, who meanwhile had taken up the play, and with seeming carelessness was turning over the first act, soon settled the business.

"I must entreat Miss Julia Bertram," said he, "not to engage in the part of Agatha, or it will be the ruin of all my solemnity. You must not, indeed you must not (turning to her). I could not stand your countenance dressed up in woe and paleness. The many laughs we have had together would infallibly come across me, and Frederick and his knapsack would be obliged to run away."

Pleasantly, courteously, it was spoken; but the manner was lost in the matter to Julia's feelings. She saw a glance at Maria, which confirmed the injury to herself: it was a scheme, a trick; she was slighted, Maria was preferred; the smile of triumph which Maria was trying to suppress showed how well it was understood; and before

[191]

Julia could command herself enough to speak, her brother gave his weight against her too, by saying, "Oh yes! Maria must be Agatha. Maria will be the best Agatha. Though Julia fancies she prefers tragedy, I would not trust her in it, There is nothing of tragedy about her. She has not the look of it. Her features are not tragic features, and she walks too quick, and speaks too quick, and would not keep her countenance. She had better do the old countrywoman: the Cottager's wife; you had, indeed, Julia. Cottager's wife is a very pretty part, I assure you. The old lady relieves the high-flown benevolence of her husband with a good deal of spirit. You shall be Cottager's wife."

"Cottager's wife!" cried Mr Yates. "What are you talking of? The most trivial, paltry, insignificant part; the merest commonplace; not a tolerable speech in the whole. Your sister do that! It is an insult to propose it. At Ecclesford the governess was to have done it. We all agreed that it could not be offered to anybody else. A little more justice, Mr Manager, if you please. You do not deserve the office, if you cannot appreciate the talents of your company a little better."

"Why as to that, my good friend, till I and my company have really acted there must be some guesswork; but I mean no disparagement to Julia. We cannot have two Agathas, and we must have one Cottager's wife; and I am sure I set her the example of moderation myself in being satisfied with the old Butler. If the part is trifling she will have more credit in making something of it; and if she is so desperately bent against everything humorous, let her take Cottager's speeches instead of Cottager's wife's, and so change the parts all through; he is solemn and pathetic enough, I am sure. It could make no difference in the play, and as for Cottager himself, when he has got his wife's speeches, I would undertake him with all my heart."

[192]

"With all your partiality for Cottager's wife," said Henry Crawford, "it will be impossible to make anything of it fit for your sister, and we must not suffer her good nature to be imposed on. We must not allow her to accept the part. She must not be left to her own complaisance. Her talents will be wanted in Amelia. Amelia is a character more difficult to be well represented than even Agatha. I consider Amelia is the most difficult character in the whole piece. It requires great powers, great nicety, to give her playfulness and simplicity without extravagance. I have seen good actresses fail in the part. Simplicity, indeed, is beyond the reach of almost every actress by profession. It requires a delicacy of feeling which they have not. It [193] requires a gentlewoman—a Julia Bertram. You will undertake it, I hope?"turning to her with a look of anxious entreaty, which softened her a little; but while she hesitated what to say, her brother again interposed with Miss Crawford's better claim,

"No, no, Julia must not be Amelia. It is not at all the part for her. She would not like it. She would not do well. She is too tall and robust. Amelia should be a small, light, girlish, skipping figure. It is fit for Miss Crawford, and Miss Crawford only. She looks the part, and I am persuaded will do it admirably."

Without attending to this, Henry Crawford continued his supplication. "You must oblige us," said he, "indeed you must. When you have studied the character, I am sure you will feel it suits you. Tragedy may be your choice, but it will certainly appear that comedy chooses you. You will be to visit me in prison with a basket of provisions; you will not refuse to visit me in prison? I think I see you coming in with your basket?"

The influence of his voice was felt. Julia wavered; but was he only trying to soothe and pacify her, and make her overlook the previous affront? She distrusted him. The slight had been most determined. He was, perhaps, but at treacherous play with her. She looked sus-[194] piciously at her sister; Maria's countenance was to decide it; if she were vexed and alarmed—but Maria looked all serenity and satisfaction, and Julia well knew that on this ground Maria could not be happy but at her expense. With hasty indignation, therefore, and a tremulous voice, she said to him, "You do not seem afraid of not keeping your countenance when I come in with a basket of provisions—though one might have supposed—but it is only as Agatha that I was to be so overpowering!" She stopped, Henry Crawford looked rather foolish, and as if he did not know what to say Tom Bertram began again—

"Miss Crawford must be Amelia. She will be an excellent Amelia."

"Do not be afraid of my wanting the character," cried Julia, with angry quickness: "I am not to be Agatha, and I am sure I will do nothing else; and as to Amelia, it is of all parts in the world the most disgusting to me. I quite detest her. An odious, little, pert, unnatural, impudent girl. I have always protested against comedy, and this is comedy in its worst form." And so saying, she walked hastily out of the room, leaving awkward feelings to more than one, but exciting small compassion in any except Fanny, who had been a quiet auditor of the whole, and who could not think of her as under the agitations of jealousy without great pity.

[195]

A short silence succeeded her leaving them; but her brother soon returned to business and Lovers' Vows, and was eagerly looking over the play, with Mr Yates's help, to ascertain what scenery would be necessary, while Maria and Henry Crawford conversed together in an under voice, and the declaration with which she began of, "I am sure I would give up the part to Julia most willingly, but that though I shall probably do it very ill, I feel persuaded she would do it worse," was doubtless receiving all the compliments it called for.

When this had lasted some time, the division of the party was completed by Tom Bertram and Mr Yates walking off together to consult farther in the room now beginning to be called the Theatre, and Miss Bertram's resolving to go down to the Parsonage herself with the offer of Amelia to Miss Crawford; and Fanny remained alone.

The first use she made of her solitude was to take up the volume which had been left on the table, and begin to acquaint herself with the play of which she had heard so much. Her curiosity was all awake, and she ran through it with an eagerness which was suspended only by intervals of astonishment, that it could be chosen in the present instance, that it could be proposed and accepted in a private theatre! Agatha and

[196]

Amelia appeared to her in their different ways so totally improper for home representation; the situation of one, and the language of the other, so unfit to be expressed by any woman of modesty, that she could hardly suppose her cousins could be aware of what they were engaging in; and longed to have them roused as soon as possible by the remonstrance which Edmund would certainly make.

CHAPTER XV.

MISS CRAWFORD accepted the part very readily; and soon after Miss Bertram's return from the Parsonage, Mr Rushworth arrived, and another character was consequently cast. He had the offer of Count Cassel and Anhalt, and at first did not know which to choose, and wanted Miss Bertram to direct him; but upon being made to understand the different style of the characters, and which was which, and recollecting that he had once seen the play in London, and had thought Anhalt a very stupid fellow, he soon decided for the Count. Miss Bertram approved the decision, for the less he had to learn the better; and though she could not sympathise in his wish that the Count and Agatha might be to act together, nor wait very patiently while he was slowly turning over the leaves with the hope of still discovering such a scene, she very kindly took his part in hand, and curtailed every speech that admitted being shortened; besides pointing out the necessity of his being very much dressed, and choosing his colours. Mr Rushworth liked the idea of his finery very well, though affecting to despise it; and was too much engaged with what his own appearance would be, to think of the others, or draw any of those conclusions, or feel any of that displeasure which Maria had been half prepared for.

[197]

Thus much was settled before Edmund, who had been out all the morning, knew anything of the matter; but when he entered the drawingroom before dinner, the buz of discussion was high between Tom, Maria, and Mr Yates; and Mr Rushworth stepped forward with great alacrity to tell him the agreeable news.

"We have got a play," said he. "It is to be Lovers' Vows; and I am to be Count Cassel, and am to come in first with a blue dress, and a pink satin cloak, and afterwards am to have another fine fancy suit, by way of a shooting-dress. I do not know how I shall like it."

Fanny's eyes followed Edmund, and her heart beat for him as she heard this speech, and saw his look, and felt what his sensations must be.

[198]

"Lovers' Vows!" in a tone of the greatest amazement, was his only reply to Mr Rushworth, and he turned towards his brother and sisters as if hardly doubting a contradiction.

"Yes," cried Mr Yates. "After all our debatings and difficulties, we find there is nothing so unexceptionable, as Lovers' Vows. The wonder is, that it should not have been thought of before. My stupidity was abominable, for here we have all the advantage of what I saw at Ecclesford; and it is so useful to have anything of a model! We have cast almost every part."

"But what do you do for women?" said Edmund gravely, and looking at Maria.

Maria blushed in spite of herself as she answered, "I take the part which Lady Ravenshaw was to have done, and (with a bolder eye) Miss Crawford is to be Amelia."

"I should not have thought it the sort of play to be so easily filled up, with us," replied Edmund, turning away to the fire, where sat his mother, aunt, and Fanny, and seating himself with a look of great vexation.

Mr Rushworth followed him to say, "I come in three times, and have two-and-forty speeches. That's something, is not it? But I do not much like the idea of being so fine. I shall hardly know myself in a blue dress, and a pink satin cloak."

Edmund could not answer him. In a few minutes Mr Bertram was called out of the room to satisfy some doubts of the carpenter; and being accompanied by Mr Yates, and followed soon afterwards by Mr Rushworth, Edmund almost immediately took the opportunity of saying, "I cannot before Mr Yates speak what I feel as to this play, without reflecting on his friends at Ecclesford; but I must now, my dear Maria, tell you, that I think it exceedingly unfit for private representation, and that I hope you will give it up. I cannot but suppose you will when you have read it carefully over. Read only the first act aloud to either your mother or aunt, and see how you can approve it. It will not be necessary to send you to your father's judgment, I am convinced."

[199]

"We see things very differently," cried Maria. "I am perfectly acquainted with the play, I assure you; and with a very few omissions, and so forth, which will be made, of course, I can see nothing objectionable in it; and I am not the only young woman you find, who thinks it very fit for private representation."

"I am sorry for it," was his answer; "but in this matter it is you who are to lead. You must set the example. If others have blundered, it is your place to put them right, and show them what true delicacy is. In all points of decorum, your conduct must be law to the rest of the party."

[200]

This picture of her consequence had some effect, for no one loved better to lead than Maria; and with far more good humour she answered, "I am much obliged to you, Edmund; you mean very well, I am sure; but I still think you see things too strongly; and I really cannot undertake to harangue all the rest upon a subject of this kind. There would be the greatest indecorum, I think."

"Do you imagine that I could have such an idea in my head? No: let your conduct be the only harangue. Say that, on examining the part, you feel yourself unequal to it; that you find it requiring more exertion and confidence than you can be supposed to have. Say this with firmness, and it will be quite enough. All who can distinguish will understand your motive. The play will be given up, and your delicacy honoured as it ought."

"Do not act anything improper, my dear," said Lady Bertram. "Sir Thomas would not like it. Fanny, ring the bell; I must have my dinner. To be sure Julia is dressed by this time."

"I am convinced, madam," said Edmund, preventing Fanny, "that Sir Thomas would not like it."

"There, my dear, do you hear what Edmund says?"

"If I were to decline the part," said Maria, with renewed zeal, "Julia would certainly take it."

[201]

"What!" cried Edmund, "if she knew your reasons!"

"Oh! she might think the difference between us— the difference in our situations—that she need not be so scrupulous as I might feel necessary. I am sure she would argue so. No: you must excuse me; I cannot retract my consent; it is too far settled, everybody would be so disappointed, Tom would be quite angry; and if we are so very nice, we shall never act anything."

"I was just going to say the very same thing," said Mrs Norris. "If every play is to be objected to, you will act nothing, and the preparations will be all so much money thrown away, and I am sure that would be a discredit to us all. I do not know the play; but, as Maria says, if there is anything a little too warm (and it is so with most of them) it can be easily left out. We must not be over precise, Edmund. As Mr Rushworth is to act too, there can be no harm. I only wish Tom had known his own mind when the carpenters began, for there was the loss of half a day's work about those side-doors. The curtain will be a good job, however. The maids do their work very well, and I think we shall be able to send back some dozens of the rings. There is no occasion to put them so very close together. I am of some use, I hope, in [202] preventing waste and making the most of things. There should always be one steady head to superintend so many young ones. I forgot to tell Tom of something that happened to me this very day. I had been looking about me in the poultry yard, and was just coming out, when who should I see but Dick Jackson making up to the servants' hall-door with two bits of deal board in his hand, bringing them to father, you may be sure; mother had chanced to send him of a message to father, and then father had bid him bring up them two bits of board, for he could not no how do without them. I knew what all this meant. for the servants' dinner-bell was ringing at the very moment over our heads; and as I hate such encroaching people (the Jacksons are very encroaching, I have always said so: just the sort of people to get all they can), I said to the boy directly (a great lubberly fellow of ten years old, you know, who ought to be ashamed of himself); 'I'll take the boards to your father, Dick, so get you home again as fast as you can.' The boy looked very silly, and turned away without offering a word, for I believe I might speak pretty sharp; and I dare say it will cure him of coming marauding about the house for one while. I hate such greediness; so good as your father is to the family, employing the man all the year round!"

Nobody was at the trouble of an answer; the others soon returned; and Edmund found that to have endeavoured to set them right must be his only satisfaction.

Dinner passed heavily. Mrs Norris related again her triumph over Dick Jackson, but neither play nor preparation were otherwise much talked of, for Edmund's disapprobation was felt even by his brother, though he would not have owned it. Maria, wanting Henry Crawford's animating support, thought the subject better avoided. Mr Yates, who was trying to make himself agreeable to Julia, found her gloom less impentrable on any topic than that of his regret at her secession from their company; and Mr Rushworth, having only his own part and his own dress in his head, had soon talked away all that could be said of either.

But the concerns of the theatre were suspended only for an hour or two, there was still a great deal to be settled; and the spirits of evening giving fresh courage, Tom, Maria, and Mr Yates, soon after their being re-assembled in the drawing-room, seated themselves in committee at a separate table, with the play open before them, and were just getting deep in the subject, when a most welcome interruption was given by the entrance of Mr and Miss Crawford, who, late and dark, and dirty as it was, could not help [204] coming, and were received with the most grateful joy.

"Well, how do you go on?" and "What have you settled?" and "Oh! we can do nothing without you," followed the first salutations; and Henry Crawford was soon seated with the other three at the table, while his sister made her way to Lady Bertram, and with pleasant attention was complimenting her. "I must really congratulate your ladyship," said she, "on the play being chosen; for though you have borne it with exemplary patience, I am sure you must be sick of all our noise and difficulties. The actors may be glad, but the by-standers must be infinitely more thankful for a decision; and I do sincerely give you joy, madam, as well as Mrs Norris, and everybody else who is in the same predicament," glancing half fearfully, half slily, beyond Fanny to Edmund.

She was very civilly answered by Lady Bertram, but Edmund said nothing. His being only a by-stander was not disclaimed. After continuing in chat with the party round the fire a few minutes, Miss Crawford returned to the party round the table; and standing by them, seemed to interest herself in their arrangements till, as if struck by a sudden recollection, she exclaimed, "My good friends, you are most composedly at work upon these cottages and ale-houses, inside and out; but pray, let me know my fate in the meanwhile. Who is to be Anhalt? What gentleman among you am I to have the pleasure of making love to?"

[205]

For a moment no one spoke; and then many spoke together to tell the same melancholy truth, that they had not yet got any Anhalt. "Mr Rushworth was to be Count Cassel, but no one had yet undertaken Anhalt."

"I had my choice of the parts," said Mr Rushworth; "but I thought I should like the Count best, though I do not much relish the finery I am to have."

"You chose very wisely, I am sure," replied Miss Crawford, with a brightened look; "Anhalt is a heavy part."

"The Count has two-and-forty speeches," returned Mr Rushworth, "which is no trifle."

"I am not at all surprised," said Miss Crawford, after a short pause, "at this want of an Anhalt. Amelia deserves no better. Such a forward young lady may well frighten the men."

"I should be but too happy in taking the part, if it were possible," cried Tom; "but, unluckily, the Butler and Anhalt are in together. I will not entirely give it up, however; I will try what can be done—I will look it over again."

"Your brother should take the part," said Mr Yates, in a low voice. "Do not you think he would?"

[206]

"I shall not ask him," replied Tom, in a cold, determined manner.

Miss Crawford talked of something else, and soon afterwards rejoined the party at the fire.

"They do not want me at all," said she, seating herself. "I only puzzle them, and oblige them to make civil speeches. Mr Edmund Bertram, as you do not act yourself, you will be a disinterested adviser; and, therefore, I apply to you. What shall we do for an Anhalt? Is it practicable for any of the others to double it? What is your advice?"

"My advice," said he calmly, "is that you change the play."

"I should have no objection," she replied; "for though I should not particularly dislike the part of Amelia, if well supported, that is, if everything went well, I shall be sorry to be an inconvenience; but as they do not choose to hear your advice at that table (looking round), it certainly will not be taken."

Edmund said no more.

"If any part could tempt you to act, I suppose it would be Anhalt," observed the lady archly, after a short pause; "for he is a clergyman, you know."

"That circumstance would by no means tempt me," he replied, "for I should be sorry to make the character ridiculous by bad acting. It must be very difficult to keep Anhalt from apearing a formal, solemn lecturer; and the man who chooses the profession itself, is, perhaps, one of the last who would wish to represent it on the stage."

[207]

Miss Crawford was silenced, and with some feelings of resentment and mortification, moved her chair considerably nearer the tea-table, and gave all her attention to Mrs Norris, who was presiding there.

"Fanny," cried Tom Bertram, from the other table, where the conference was eagerly carrying on, and the conversation incessant, "we want your services."

Fanny was up in a moment, expecting some errand; for the habit of employing her in that way was not yet overcome, in spite of all that Edmund could do.

"Oh! we do not want to disturb you from your seat. We do not want your present services. We shall only want you in our play. You must be Cottager's wife."

"Me!" cried Fanny, sitting down again with a most frightened look. "Indeed you must excuse me. I could not act anything if you were to give me the world. No, indeed, I cannot act."

"Indeed, but you must, for we cannot excuse you. It need not frighten you; it is nothing of a part, a mere nothing, not above half-a-dozen speeches altogether, and it will not much signify if nobody hears a word you say, so you may be as creep-mouse as you like, but we must have you to look at."

[208]

"If you are afraid of half-a-dozen speeches," cried Mr Rushworth, "what would you do with such a part as mine? I have forty-two to learn."

"It is not that I am afraid of learning by heart," said Fanny, shocked to find herself at that moment the only speaker in the room, and to feel that almost every eye was upon her; "but I really cannot act."

"Yes, yes, you can act well enough for us. Learn your part, and we will teach you all the rest. You have only two scenes, and as I shall be Cottager, I'll put you in and push you about, and you will do it very well, I'll answer for it."

"No, indeed, Mr Bertram, you must excuse me. You cannot have an idea. It would be absolutely imposible for me. If I were to undertake it, I should only disappoint you."

"Phoo! Phoo! Do not be so shamefaced. You'll do it very well. Every allowance will be made for you. We do not expect perfection.. You must get a brown gown, and a white apron, and a mob cap, and we must make you a few wrinkles, and a little of the crowsfoot at the corner of your eyes, and you will be a very proper, little old woman."

"You must excuse me, indeed you must excuse me," cried Fanny, growing more and more red from excessive agitation, and looking distressfully at Edmund, who was kindly observing her: but unwilling to exasperate his brother by interference, gave her only an encouraging smile. Her entreaty had no effect on Tom; he only said again what he had said before, and it was not merely Tom, for the requisition was now backed by Maria, and Mr Crawford, and Mr Yates, with an urgency which differed from his but in being more gentle or more ceremonious, and which altogether was quite overpowering to Fanny; and before she could breathe after it, Mrs Norris completed the whole, by thus addressing her in a whisper at once angry and audible:---"What a piece of work here is about nothing, I am quite ashamed of you, Fanny, to make such a difficulty of obliging your cousins in a trifle of this sort-so kind as they are to you! Take the part with a good grace, and let us hear no more of the matter, I entreat."

[209]

"Do not urge her, madam," said Edmund. "It is not fair to urge her in this manner. You see she does not like to act. Let her choose for herself, as well as the rest of us. Her judgment may be quite as safely trusted. Do not urge her any more."

"I am not going to urge her," replied Mrs Norris sharply; "but I shall think her a very [210] obstinate, ungrateful girl, if she does not do what her aunt and cousins wish her; very ungrateful, indeed, considering who and what she is."

Edmund was too angry to speak; but Miss Crawford looking for a moment with astonished eyes at Mrs Norris, and then at Fanny, whose tears were beginning to show themselves, immediately said, with some keenness, "I do not like my situation; this place is too hot for me," and moved away her chair to the opposite side of the table, close to Fanny, saying to her, in a kind, low whisper, as she placed herself, "Never mind, my dear Miss Price, this is a cross evening; everybody is cross and teasing, but do not let us mind them;" and with pointed attention continued to talk to her and endeavour to raise her spirits, in spite of being out of spirits herself. By a look at her brother, she prevented any farther entreaty from the theatrical board, and the really good feelings by which she was almost purely governed, were rapidly restoring her to all the little she had lost in Edmund's favour.

Fanny did not love Miss Crawford; but she felt very much obliged to her for her present kindness; and when, from taking notice of her work, and wishing she could work as well, and begging for the pattern, and supposing Fanny was now preparing for her appearance, as of course she would come out when her cousin was married, Miss Crawford proceeded to inquire if she had heard lately from her brother at sea, and said that she had quite a curiosity to see him, and imagined him a very fine young man, and advised Fanny to get his picture drawn before he went to sea again,—she could not help admitting it to be very agreeable flattery, or help listening, and answering with more animation than she had intended.

[211]

The consultation upon the play still went on, and Miss Crawford's attention was first called from Fanny, by Tom Bertram's telling her, with infinite regret, that he found it absolutely impossible for him to undertake the part of Anhalt in addition to the butler: he had been most anxiously trying to make it out to be feasible, but it would not do; he must give it up. "But there will not be the smallest difficulty in filling it," he added. "We have but to speak the word; we may pick and choose. I could name, at this moment, at least six young men within six miles of us, who are wild to be admitted into our company, and there are one or two that would not disgrace us; I should not be afraid to trust either of the Olivers or Charles Maddox. Tom Oliver is a very clever fellow, and Charles Maddox is as gentlemanlike as you will see anywhere, so I will take my horse early to-morrow morning, and ride over to Stoke, and settle with one of them."

[212]

While he spoke, Maria was looking apprehensively round at Edmund in full expectation that he must oppose such an enlargement of the plan as this: so contrary to all their first protestations; but Edmund said nothing. After a moment's thought, Miss Crawford calmly replied, "As far as I am concerned, I can have no objection to anything that you all think eligible. Have I ever seen either of the gentlemen? Yes, Mr Charles Maddox dined at my sister's one day, did not he, Henry? A quiet looking young man. I remember him. Let him be applied to, if you please, for it will be less unpleasant to me than to have a perfect stranger."

Charles Maddox was to be the man. Tom repeated his resolution of going to him early on the morrow; and though Julia, who had scarcely opened her lips before, observed, in a sarcastic manner, and with a glance first at Maria, and then at Edmund, that "the Mansfield theatricals would enliven the whole neighbourhood exceedingly," Edmund still held his peace, and showed his feelings only by a determined gravity.

"I am not very sanguine as to our play," said Miss Crawford, in an under voice to Fanny, after some consideration; "and I can tell Mr Maddox that I shall shorten some of his speeches, and a great many of my own, before we rehearse together. It will be very disagreeable, and by no means what I expected."

CHAPTER XVI.

T was not in Miss Crawford's power to talk Fanny into any real forgetfulness of what had passed. When the evening was over, she went to bed full of it, her nerves still agitated by the shock of such an attack from her cousin Tom, so public and so persevered in, and her spirits sinking under her aunt's unkind reflection and reproach. To be called into notice in such a manner, to hear that it was but the prelude to something so infinitely worse, to be told that she must do what was so impossible as to act; and then to have the charge of obstinacy and ingratitude follow it, enforced with such a hint at the dependence of her situation, had been too distressing at the time to make the remembrance when she was alone much less so, especially with the superadded dread of what the morrow might produce in continuation of the subject. Miss Crawford had protected her only for the time; and if she were applied to again among themselves with all the authoritative urgency that Tom and Maria were capable of, and Edmund perhaps away, what should she do? She fell asleep before she could answer the question, and found it quite as puzzling when she awoke the next morning. The little white attic, which had continued her [214] sleeping room ever since her first entering the family, proving incompetent to suggest any reply, she had recourse, as soon as she was dressed, to another apartment more spacious and more meet for walking about in and thinking, and of which she had now for some time been almost equally mistress. It had been their schoolroom: so called till the Miss Bertrams would not allow it to be called so any longer, and inhabited as such to a later period. There Miss Lee had lived, and there they had read and written, and talked and laughed, till within the last three years, when she had guitted them. The room had then become useless, and for some time was quite deserted, except by Fanny, when she visited her plants, or wanted one of the books, which she was still glad to keep there, from the deficiency of space and accommodation in her little chamber above: but gradually, as her value for the comforts of it increased, she had added to her possessions, and spent more of her time there; and having nothing to oppose her, had so naturally and so artlessly worked herself into it, that it was now generally admitted to be her's. The East room, as it had been called ever since Maria was sixteen, was now considered Bertram Fanny's, almost as decidedly as the white attic: the smallness of the one making the use of the other so evidently reasonable, that the Miss

[215]

Bertrams, with every superiority in their own apartments, which their own sense of superiority could demand, were entirely approving it; and Mrs Norris, having stipulated for there never being a fire in it on Fanny's account, was tolerably resigned to her having the use of what nobody else wanted, though the terms in which she sometimes spoke of the indulgence seemed to imply that it was the best room in the house.

The aspect was so favourable, that even without a fire it was habitable in many an early spring and late autumn morning, to such a willing mind as Fanny's; and while there was a gleam of sunshine, she hoped not to be driven from it entirely, even when winter came. The comfort of it in her hours of leisure was extreme. She could go there after anything unpleasant below, and find immediate consolation in some pursuit, or some train of thought at hand. Her plants, her books-of which she had been a collector from the first hour of her commanding a shilling-her writing-desk, and her works of charity and ingenuity, were all within her reach; or if indisposed for employment, if nothing but musing would do, she could scarcely see an object in that room which had not an interesting remembrance connected with it. Everything was a friend, or bore her thoughts to a friend; and though there had been sometimes much of suffering to her; though her motives had often been misunderstood, her feelings disregarded, and her comprehension undervalued; though she had known the pains of tyranny, or ridicule, and neglect; yet almost every recurrence of either had led to something consolatory; her aunt Bertram had spoken for her, or Miss Lee had been encouraging, or, what was yet more frequent or more dear, Edmund had been her champion and her friend, he had supported her cause or explained her meaning; he had told her not to cry, or had given her some proof of affection which made her tears delightful, and the whole was now so blended together, so harmonized by distance, that every former affliction had its charm. The room was most dear to her, and she would not have changed its furniture for the handsomest in the house, though what had been originally plain, had suffered all the ill-usage of children; and its greatest elegancies and ornaments were a faded footstool of Julia's work, too ill done for the drawing-room, three transparencies, made in a rage for transparencies, for the three lower panes of one window, where Tintern Abbey held its station between a cave in Italy and a moonlight lake in Cumberland, a collection of family profiles, thought unworthy of being anywhere else, over the mantle-piece, and by their side, and pinned against the wall, a small sketch of a ship sent four years ago from the Mediterranean by William, with H. M. S. Antwerp at the bottom, in letters as tall as the main-mast.

[216]

[217]

To this nest of comforts Fanny now walked down to try its influence on an agitated, doubting spirit, to see if by looking at Edmund's profile she could catch any of his counsel, or by giving air to her geraniums she might inhale a breeze of mental strength herself. But she had more than fears of her own perseverance to remove: she had begun to feel undecided as to what she ought to do; and as she walked round the room her doubts were increasing. Was she right in refusing what was so warmly asked, so strongly wished for-what might be so essential to a scheme on which some of those to whom she owed the greatest complaisance had set their hearts? Was it not ill-nature, selfishness, and a fear of exposing herself? And would Edmund's judgment, would his persuasion of Sir Thomas's disapprobation of the whole, be enough to justify her in a determined denial in spite of all the rest? It would be so horrible to her to act, that she was inclined to suspect the truth and purity of her own scruples; and as she looked around her, the claims of her cousins to being obliged were strengthened by the sight of present upon present that she had received from them. The table between the windows was covered with work-[218] boxes and netting-boxes which had been given her at different times, principally by Tom; and she grew bewildered as to the amount of the debt which all these kind remembrances produced. A tap at the door roused her in the midst of this attempt to find her way to her duty, and her gentle "come in" was answered by the appearance of one, before whom all her doubts were wont to be laid. Her eyes brightened at the sight of Edmund.

"Can I speak with you, Fanny, for a few minutes?" said he.

"Yes, certainly."

"I want to consult. I want your opinion."

"My opinion!" she cried, shrinking from such a compliment, highly as it gratified her.

"Yes, your advice and opinion. I do not know what to do. This acting scheme gets worse and worse, you see. They have chosen almost as bad a play as they could, and now, to complete the business, are going to ask the help of a young man very slightly known to any of us. This is the end of all the privacy and propriety which was talked about at first. I know no harm of Charles Maddox; but the excessive intimacy which must spring from his being admitted among us in this manner is highly objectionable, the more than intimacy—the familiarity. I cannot think of it with any patience; and it does appear to me an evil of such magnitude as must if possible, be prevented. Do not you see it in the same light?"

[219]

"Yes; but what can be done? Your brother is so determined?"

"There is but one thing to be done, Fanny I must take Anhalt myself. I am well aware that nothing else will quiet Tom."

Fanny could not answer him.

"It is not at all what I like," he continued. "No man can like being driven into the *appear*ance of such inconsistency. After being known to oppose the scheme from the beginning, there is absurdity in the face of my joining them now, when they are exceeding their first plan in every respect; but I can think of no other alternative. Can you, Fanny?"

"No," said Fanny slowly, "not immediately, but —___"

"But what? I see your judgment is not with me. Think it a little over. Perhaps you are not so much aware as I am of the mischief that may, of the unpleasantness that must arise from a young man's being received in this manner; domesticated among us; authorized to come at all hours, and placed suddenly on a footing which must do away all restraints. To think only of the license which every rehearsal must tend to create. It is all very bad! Put yourself in Miss [220]

Crawford's place, Fanny. Consider what it would be to act Amelia with a stranger. She has a right to be felt for, because she evidently feels for herself. I heard enough of what she said to you last night, to understand her unwillingness to be acting with a stranger; and as she probably engaged in the part with different expectations—perhaps without considering the subject enough to know what was likely to be—it would be ungenerous, it would be really wrong to expose her to it. Her feelings ought to be respected. Does it not strike you so, Fanny? You hesitate."

"I am sorry for Miss Crawford; but I am more sorry to see you drawn in to do what you had resolved against, and what you are known to think will be disagreeable to my uncle. It will be such a triumph to the others!"

"They will not have much cause of triumph when they see how infamously I act. But, however, triumph there certainly will be, and I must brave it. But if I can be the means of restraining the publicity of the business, of limiting the exhibition, of concentrating our folly, I shall be well repaid. As I am now, I have no influence, I can do nothing: I have offended them, and they will not hear me; but when I have put them in good humor by this concession, I am not without hopes of persuading them to confine the representation within a much smaller circle than they are now in the high road for. This will be a material gain. My object is to confine it to Mrs Rushworth and the Grants. Will not this be worth gaining?"

[221]

"Yes, it will be a great point."

"But still it has not your approbation. Can you mention any other measure by which I have a chance of doing equal good?"

"No, I cannot think of anything else."

"Give me your approbation, then, Fanny. I am not comfortable without it."

"Oh, cousin!"

"If you are against me, I ought to distrust myself, and yet ——. But it is absolutely impossible to let Tom go on in this way, riding about the country in quest of anybody who can be persuaded to act—no matter whom: the look of a gentleman is to be enough. I thought you would have entered more into Miss Crawford's feelings."

"No doubt she will be very glad. It must be a great relief to her," said Fanny, trying for greater warmth of manner.

"She never appeared more amiable than in her behaviour to you last night. It gave her a very strong claim on my good-will."

"She was very kind, indeed, and I am glad to have her spared—"

[222]

She could not finish the generous effusion. Her conscience stopt her in the middle, but Edmund was satisfied.

" I shall walk down immediately after breakfast," said he, "and am sure of giving pleasure there. And now, dear Fanny, I will not interrupt you any longer. You want to be reading. But I could not be easy till I had spoken to you, and come to a decision. Sleeping or waking, my head has been full of this matter all night. It is an evil, but I am certainly making it less than it might be. If Tom is up, I shall go to him directly and get it over, and when we meet at breakfast we shall be all in high good humour at the prospect of acting the fool together with such unanimity. You in the meanwhile will be taking a trip into China, I suppose. How does Lord Macartney go on? (opening a volume on the table and then taking up some others.) And here are Crabbe's Tales, and the Idler, at hand to relieve you, if you tire of your great book. I admire your little establishment exceedingly; and as soon as I am gone, you will empty your head of all this nonsense of acting, and sit comfortably down to your table. But do not stay here to be cold."

He went; but there was no reading, no China, no composure for Fanny. He had told her the most extraordinary, the most inconceivable, the most unwelcome news: and she could think of nothing else. To be acting! After all his objections-objections so just and so public! After all that she had heard him say, and seen him look, and known him to be feeling. Could it be possible? Edmund so inconsistent! Was he not deceiving himself? Was he not wrong? Alas! it was all Miss Crawford's doing. She had seen her influence in every speech, and was miserable. The doubts and alarms as to her own conduct, which had previously distressed her, and which had all slept while she listened to him, were become of little consequence now. This deeper anxiety swallowed them up. Things should take their course; she cared not how it ended. Her cousins might attack, but could hardly tease her. She was beyond their reach; and if at last obliged to yield-no matter-it was all misery now.

CHAPTER XVII.

T was, indeed, a triumphant day to Mr Bertram and Maria. Such a victory over Edmund's discretion had been beyond their hopes, and was most delightful. There was no longer anything to disturb them in their darling [224] project, and they congratulated each other in private on the jealous weakness to which they attributed the change, with all the glee of feelings gratified in every way. Edmund might still look grave, and say he did not like the scheme in general, and must disapprove the play in particular; their point was gained; he was to act, and he was driven to it by the force of selfish inclinations only. Edmund had descended from that moral elevation which he had maintained befcre, and they were both as much the better as the happier for the descent.

They behaved very well, however, to him on the occasion, betraving, no exultation beyond the lines about the corners of the mouth, and seemed to think it as great an escape to be quit of the intrusion of Charles Maddox, as if they had been forced into admitting him against their inclination. "To have it quite in their own family circle was what they had particularly wished. A stranger among them would have been the destruction of all their comfort;" and when Edmund, pursuing that idea, gave a hint of his hope as to the limitation of the audience, they were ready, in the complaisance of the moment, to promise anything. It was all good humour and encouragement. Mrs Norris offered to contrive his dress, Mr Yates assured him that Anhalt's last scene with the Baron admitted a good deal [225] of action and emphasis, and Mr Rushworth undertook to count his speeches.

"Perhaps," said Tom, "Fanny may be more disposed to oblige us now. Perhaps you may persuade her."

"No, she is quite determined. She certainly will not act."

"Oh! very well." And not another word was said; but Fanny felt herself again in danger, and her indifference to the danger was beginning to fail her already.

There were not fewer smiles at the Parsonage than at the Park on this change in Edmund; Miss Crawford looked very lovely in her's, and entered with such an instantaneous renewal of cheerfulness into the whole affair, as could have but one effect on him. "He was certainly right in respecting such feelings; he was glad he had determined on it." And the morning wore away in satisfactions very sweet, if not very sound. One advantage resulted from it to Fanny; at the earnest request of Miss Crawford, Mrs. Grant had, with her usual good humour, agreed to undertake the part for which Fanny had been wanted; and this was all that occured to gladden her heart during the day; and even this, when imparted by Edmund, brought a pang with it, for it was Miss Crawford to whom she was obliged; it was Miss Crawford whose kind exertions were [226] to excite her gratitude, and whose merit in making them was spoken of with a glow of admiration. She was safe; but peace and safety were unconnected here. Her mind had been never farther from peace. She could not feel that she had done wrong herself, but she was disquieted in every other way. Her heart and her judgment were equally against Edmund's decision: she could not acquit his unsteadiness, and his happiness under it made her wretched. She was full of jealousy and agitation. Miss Crawford came with looks of gaiety which seemed an insult, with friendly expressions towards herself which she could hardly answer calmly. Everybody around her was gay and busy, prosperous and important; each had their object of interest, their part, their dress, their favourite scene, their friends and confederates: all were finding employment in consultations and comparisons, or diversions in the playful conceits they suggested. She alone was sad and insignificant; she had no share in anything; she might go or stay; she might be in the midst of their noise, or retreat from it to the solitude of the East room, without being seen or missed. She could almost think anything would have been preferable to this. Mrs Grant was of consequence: her good nature had honourable mention: her taste and her time were considered; her presence was wanted; she was sought for and attended, and praised; and Fanny was at first in some danger of envying her the character she had accepted. But reflection brought better feelings, and shewed her that Mrs Grant was entitled to respect, which could never have belonged to her; and that, had she received even the greatest, she could never have been easy in joining a scheme which, considering only her uncle, she must condemn altogether.

[227]

Fanny's heart was not absolutely the only saddened one amongst them, as she soon began to acknowledge to herself. Julia was a sufferer, too, though not quite so blamelessly.

Henry Crawford had trifled with her feelings; but she had very long allowed, and even sought his attentions with a jealousy of her sister so reasonable as ought to have been their cure; and now that the conviction of his preference for Maria had been forced on her, she submitted to it without any alarm for Maria's situation, or any endeavour at rational tranquillity for herself. She either sat in gloomy silence, wrapt in such gravity as nothing could subdue, no curiosity touch, no wit amuse; or allowing the attentions of Mr Yates, was talking with forced gaiety to him alone, and ridiculing the acting of the others.

For a day or two after the affront was given [228]

Henry Crawford had endeavoured to do it away by the usual attack of gallantry and compliment, but he had not cared enough about it to persevere against a few repulses; and becoming soon too busy with his play to have time for more than one flirtation, he grew indifferent to the quarrel, or rather thought it a lucky occurrence, as quietly putting an end to what might ere long have raised expectations in more than Mrs Grant. She was not pleased to see Julia excluded from the play, and sitting by disregarded; but as it was not a matter which really involved her happiness, as Henry must be the best judge of his own, and as he did assure her, with a most persuasive smile, that neither he nor Julia had ever had a serious thought of each other, she could only renew her former caution as to the elder sister, entreat him not to risk his tranquillity by too much admiration there, and then gladly take her share in anything that brought cheerfulness to the young people in general, and that did so particularly promote the pleasure of the two so dear to her.

"I rather wonder Julia is not in love with Henry," was her observation to Mary.

"I dare say she is," replied Mary coldly. "I imagine both sisters are."

"Both! no, no, that must not be. Do not give him a hint of it. Think of Mr Rushworth!"

[229]

"You had better tell Miss Bertram to think of Mr Rushworth. It may do her some good. often think of Mr Rushworth's property an independence, and wish them in other hands; bu I never think of him. A man might escape of profession and represent the county."

"I dare say he will be in parliament soon When Sir Thomas comes, I dare say he will b in for some borough, but there has been nobod to put him in the way of doing anything yet."

"Sir Thomas is to achieve many mighty thing when he comes home," said Mary, after a pause "Do you remember Hawkins Browne's 'Address to Tobacco,' in imitation of Pope?—

> 'Blest leaf ! whose aromatic gales dispense To Templars modesty, to Parsons sense.'

I will parody them-

Blest Knight! whose dictatorial looks dispense To Children affluence, to Rushworth sense.

Will not that do, Mrs Grant? Everything seems to depend upon Sir Thomas's return.

"You will find his consequence very just and reasonable when you see him in his family, I as sure you. I do not think we do so well without him. He has a fine dignified manner, which suits the head of such a house, and keeps everybody in their place. Lady Bertram seems more of a cypher now than when he is at home; and nobody else can keep Mrs Norris in order. But, Mary, [230] do not fancy that Maria Bertram cares for Henry. I am sure Julia does not, or she would not have flirted as she did last night with Mr Yates; and though he and Maria are very good friends, I think she likes Sotherton too well to be inconstant."

"I would not give much for Mr Rushworth's chance, if Henry stept in before the articles were signed."

"If you have such a suspicion, something must be done; and as soon as the play is all over, we will talk to him seriously, and make him know his own mind; and if he means nothing, we will send him off, though he is Henry, for a time."

Julia did suffer, however, though Mrs Grant discerned it not, and though it escaped the notice of many of her own family likewise. She had loved, she did love still, and she had all the suffering which a warm temper and a high spirit were likely to endure under the disappointment of a dear, though irrational hope, with a strong sense of ill-usage. Her heart was sore and angry, and she was capable only of angry consolations. The sister with whom she was used to be on easy terms was now become her greatest enemy: they were alienated from each other; and Julia was not superior to the hope of some distressing end to the attentions which were still carrying on there, some punishment to Maria for conduct so shameful towards herself as well as towards Mr Rus worth. With no material fault of temper, of difference of opinion, to prevent their being ver good friends while their interests were the sam the sisters, under such a trial as this, had not as fection or principle enough to make them met ciful or just, to give them honour or compassion Maria felt her triumph, and pursued her purposs careless of Julia; and Julia could never see Mari distinguished by Henry Crawford without trust ing that it would create jealousy, and bring public disturbance at last.

[231]

Fanny saw and pitied much of this in Julia but there was no outward fellowship betwee them. Julia made no communication, and Fann took no liberties. They were two solitary suffer ers, or connected only by Fanny's consciousness

The inattention of the two brothers and the aunt to Julia's discomposure, and their blindness to its true cause, must be imputed to the fulness of their own minds. They were totally preoc cupied. Tom was engrossed by the concerns of his theatre, and saw nothing that did not immediately relate to it. Edmund, between his theat rical and his real part—between Miss Craw ford's claims and his own conduct—between love and consistency, was equally unobservant; and Mrs Norris was too busy in contriving and directing the general little matters of the company. [232] superintending their various dresses with economical expedient, for which nobody thanked her, and saving, with delighted integrity, half-acrown here and there to the absent Sir Thomas, to have leisure for watching the behaviour, or guarding the happiness of his daughters.

CHAPTER XVIII.

VERYTHING was now in a regular train; theatre, actors, actresses, and dresses, were all getting forward; but though no other great impediments arose, Fanny found, before many days were past, that it was not all uninterrupted enjoyment to the party themselves, and that she had not to witness the continuance of such unanimity and delight, as had been almost too much for her at first. Everybody began to have their vexation. Edmund had many. Entirely against his judgment, a scene-painter arrived from town, and was at work, much to the increase of the expenses, and, what was worse, of the eclat of their proceedings; and his brother, instead of being really guided by him as to the privacy of the representation, was giving an invitation to every family who came in his way. Tom himself began to fret over the scene-painter's slow progress, and to feel the miseries of waiting. He had learned his part—all his par for he took every triffing one that could be unite with the butler, and began to be impatient be acting; and every day thus unemployed w tending to increase his sense of the insignifican of all his parts together, and make him mo ready to regret that some other play had not been chosen.

[233]

Fanny, being always a very courteous listene and often the only listener at hand, come in fe the complaints and the distresses of most of ther She knew that Mr Yates was in general though to rant dreadfully; that Mr Yates was disa pointed in Henry Crawford; that Tom Bertran spoke so quick he would be unintelligible; the Mrs Grant spoiled everything by laughing; that Edmund was behind-hand with his part, and that it was a misery to have anything to do with M Rushworth, who was wanting a prompte through every speech. She knew, also, that poo Mr Rushworth could seldom get anybody to re hearse with him: his complaint came before her a well as the rest; and so decided to her eye wa her cousin Maria's avoidance of him, and se needlessly often the rehearsal of the first scene between her and Mr Crawford, that she had soon all the terror of other complaints from him So far from being all satisfied and all enjoying [234] she found everybody requiring something they had not, and giving occasion of discontent to the others. Everybody had a part either too long or too short; nobody would attend as they ought; nobody would remember on which side they were to come in; nobody but the complainer would observe any directions.

Fanny believed herself to derive as much innocent enjoyment from the play as any of them; Henry Crawford acted well, and it was a pleasure to her to creep into the theatre, and attend the rehearsal of the first act, in spite of the feelings it excited in some speeches for Maria. Maria, she also thought, acted well, too well; and after the first rehearsal or two, Fanny began to be their only audience, and sometimes as prompter, sometimes as spectator, was often very useful. As far as she could judge, Mr Crawford was considerably the best actor of all; he had more confidence than Edmund, more judgment than Tom, more talent and taste than Mr Yates. She did not like him as a man, but she must admit him to be the best actor, and on this point there were not many who differed from her. Mr Yates, indeed, exclaimed against his tameness and insipidity; and the day came at last, when Mr Rushworth turned to her with a black look, and said, "Do you think there is anything so very fine in all this? For the life and soul of me, I cannot admire him; and between ou selves, to see such an undersized, little, mea looking man, set up for a fine actor is ve ridiculous in my opinion."

[235]

From this moment there was a return of l former jealousy, which Maria, from increasing hopes of Crawford, was at little pains to remov and the chances of Mr Rushworth's ever attai ing to the knowledge of his two-and-for speeches became much less. As to his ever ma ing anything tolerable of them, nobody had the smallest idea of that except his mother; she, it deed, regretted that his part was not more con siderable, and deferred coming over to Man field till they were forward enough in their r hearsal to comprehend all his scenes; but the others aspired at nothing beyond his remembe ing the catch-word, and the first line of his speec and being able to follow the prompter throug the rest. Fanny, in her pity and kind-hear edness, was at great pains to teach him how t learn, giving him all the helps and directions i her power, trying to make an artificial memor for him, and learning every word of his par herself, but without his being much the for warder.

Many uncomfortable, anxious, apprehensive feelings she certainly had; but with all these, and other claims on her time and attention, she was [236] as far from finding herself without employment or utility amongst them, as without a companion in uneasiness; quite as far from having no demand on her leisure as on her compassion. The gloom of her first anticipations was proved to have been unfounded. She was occasionally useful to all; she was perhaps as much at peace as any.

There was a great deal of needlework to be done, moreover, in which her help was wanted; and that Mrs Norris thought her quite as well off as the rest, was evident by the manner in which she claimed it :---"Come, Fanny," she cried, "these are fine times for you, but you must not be always walking from one room to the other, and doing the lookings-on at your ease, in this way; I want you here. I have been slaving myself till I can hardly stand, to contrive Mr Rushworth's cloak without sending for any more satin; and now I think you may give me your help in putting it together. There are but three seams, you may do them in a trice. It would be lucky for me if I had nothing but the executive part to do. You are best off, I can tell you: but if nobody did more than you, we should not get on very fast."

Fanny took the work very quietly, without attempting any defence; but her kinder aunt Bertram observed on her behalf—

15

[237]

"One cannot wonder, sister, that Fanny should be delighted; it is all new to her, you know; you and I used to be very fond of a play ourselves, and so am I still; and as soon as I am a little more at leisure, I mean to look in at their rehearsals too. What is the play about, Fanny, you have never told me?"

"Oh! sister, pray do not ask her now; for Fanny is not one of those who can talk and work at the same time. It is about Lovers' Vows."

"I believe," said Fanny to her aunt Bertram, "there will be three acts rehearsed to-morrow evening, and that will give you an opportunity of seeing all the actors at once."

"You had better stay till the curtain is hung," interposed Mrs Norris; "the curtain will be hung in a day or two—there is very little sense in a play without a curtain—and I am much mistaken if you do not find it draw up into very handsome festoons."

Lady Bertram seemed quite resigned to waiting. Fanny did not share her aunt's composure; she thought of the morrow a great deal, for if the three acts were rehearsed, Edmund and Miss Crawford would then be acting together for the first time; the third act would bring a scene between them which interested her most particularly, and which she was longing and dreading to see how they would perform. The whole subject of [238] it was love—a marriage of love was to be described by the gentleman, and very little short of a declaration of love be made by the lady.

She had read, and read the scene again with many painful, many wondering emotions, and looked forward to their representation of it as a circumstance almost too interesting. She did not believe they had yet rehearsed it, even in private.

The morrow came, the plan for the evening continued, and Fanny's consideration of it did not become less agitated. She worked very diligently under her aunt's directions, but her diligence and her silence concealed a very absent, anxious mind; and about noon she made her escape with her work to the East room, that she might have no concern in another, and, as she deemed it, most unnecessary rehearsal of the first act, which Henry Crawford was just proposing, desirous at once of having her time to herself, and of avoiding the sight of Mr Rushworth. A glimpse, as she passed through the hall, of the two ladies walking up from the Parsonage, made no change in her wish of retreat, and she worked and meditated in the East room, undisturbed, for a quarter of an hour, when a gentle tap at the door was followed by the entrance of Miss Crawford.

"Am I right? Yes; this is the East room.

[239]

My dear Miss Price, I beg your pardon, but I have made my way to you on purpose to entreat your help."

Fanny, quite surprised, endeavoured to show herself mistress of the room by her civilities, and looked at the bright bars of her empty grate with concern.

"Thank you; I am quite warm, very warm. Allow me to stay here a little while, and do have the goodness to hear me my third act. I have brought my book, and if you would but rehearse it with me, I should be so obliged! I came here to-day intending to rehearse it with Edmund by ourselves—against the evening, but he is not in the way; and if he were, I do not think I could go through it with him, till I have hardened myself a little; for really there is a speech or two— You will be so good, won't you?"

Fanny was most civil in her assurances, though she could not give them in a very steady voice.

"Have you ever happened to look at the part I mean?" continued Miss Crawford, opening her book. "Here it is. I did not think much of it at first—but, upon my word—... There, look at that speech, and that, and that. How am I ever to look him in the face and say such things? Could you do it? But then he is your cousin, which makes all the difference. You must relow they with me, that I may fancy you him, and [2340] get on by degrees. You have a look of his sometimes."

"Have I? I will do my best with the greatest readiness; but I must read the part, for I can say very little of it."

"None of it I suppose. You are to have the book, of course. Now for it. We must have two chairs at hand for you to bring forward to the front of the stage. There-very good school-room chairs, not made for a theatre, I dare say; much more fitted for little girls to sit and kick their feet against when they are learning a lesson. What would your governess and your uncle say to see them used for such a purpose? Could Sir Thomas look in upon us just now, he would bless himself, for we are rehearsing all over the house. Yates is storming away in the dining-room. I heard him as I came upstairs, and the theatre is engaged of course by those indefatigable rehearsers, Agatha and Frederick. If they are not perfect, I shall be surprised. By-the-bye, I looked in upon them five minutes ago, and it happened to be exactly at one of the times when they were trying not to embrace, and Mr Rushworth was with me. I thought he began to look a little queer, so I turned it off as well as I could, by whispering to him, 'We shall have an excellent Agatha, there is something so maternal in her manner, so completely maternal in her voice and countenance.' Was not that well done of me? He brightened up directly. Now for my soliloquy."

[241]

She began, and Fanny joined in with all the modest feeling which the idea of representing Edmund was so strongly calculated to inspire; but with looks and voice so truly feminine, as to be no very good picture of a man. With such an Anhalt, however, Miss Crawford had courage enough; and they had got through half the scene, when a tap at the door brought a pause, and the entrance of Edmund, the next moment, suspended it all.

Surprise, consciousness, and pleasure, appeared in each of the three on this unexpected meeting; and as Edmund was come on the very same business that had brought Miss Crawford, consciousness and pleasure were likely to be more than momentary in them. He, too, had his book, and was seeking Fanny, to ask her to rehearse with him, and help him to prepare for the evening, without knowing Miss Crawford to be in the house; and great was the joy and animation of being thus thrown together, of comparing schemes, and sympathizing in praise of Fanny's kind offices.

She could not equal them in their warmth. Her spirits sank under the glow of theirs, and she felt herself becoming too nearly nothing to [242]

both, to have any comfort in having been sought by either. They must now rehearse together. Edmund proposed, urged, entreated it, till the lady, not very unwilling at first, could refuse no longer, and Fanny was wanted only to prompt and observe them. She was invested, indeed, with the office of judge and critic, and earnestly desired to exercise it and tell them all their faults; but from doing so every feeling within her shrank ---she could not, would not, dared not, attempt it: had she been otherwise qualified for criticism, her conscience must have restrained her from venturing at disapprobation. She believed herself to feel too much of it in the aggregate for honesty or safety in particulars. To prompt them must be enough for her; and it was sometimes more than enough; for she could not always pay attention to the book. In watching them she forgot herself; and, agitated by the increasing spirit of Edmund's manner, had once closed the page and turned away exactly as he wanted help. It was imputed to very reasonable weariness, and she was thanked and pitied; but she deserved their pity more than she hoped they would ever surmise. At last the scene was over, and Fanny forced herself to add her praise to the compliments each was giving the other; and when again alone, and able to recall the whole, she was inclined to believe their performance would, indeed, have such nature and feeling in it as must ensure their credit, and make it a very suffering exhibition to herself. Whatever might be its effect, however, she must stand the brunt of it again that very day.

The first regular rehearsal of the three first acts was certainly to take place in the evening: Mrs Grant and the Crawfords were engaged to return for that purpose as soon as they could after dinner; and every one concerned was looking forward with eagerness. There seemed a general diffusion of cheerfulness on the occasion. Tom was enjoying such an advance towards the end; Edmund was in spirits from the morning's rehearsal, and little vexations seemed everywhere smoothed away. All were alert and impatient; the ladies moved soon, the gentlemen soon followed them, and with the exception of Lady Bertram, Mrs Norris, and Julia, everybody was in the theatre at an early hour; and, having lighted it up as well as its unfinished state admitted, were waiting only the arrival of Mrs Grant and the Crawfords to begin.

They did not wait long for the Crawfords, but there was no Mrs Grant. She could not come. Dr Grant, professing an indisposition, for which he had little credit with his fair sister-in-law, could not spare his wife.

"Dr Grant is ill," said she, with mock solemn-[244]

ty. "He has been ill ever since he did not eat any of the pheasant to-day. He fancied it tough, sent away his plate, and has been suffering ever since."

Here was disappointment! Mrs Grant's nonattendance was sad indeed. Her pleasant manners and cheerful conformity made her always valuable amongst them; but now she was absolutely necessary. They could not act, they could not rehearse with any satisfaction without her. The comfort of the whole evening was destroyed. What was to be done? Tom, as Cottager, was in despair. After a pause of perplexity, some eyes began to be turned towards Fanny, and a voice or two to say, "If Miss Price would be so good as to read the part." She was immediately surrounded by supplications, everybody asked it, even Edmund said, "Do, Fanny, if it is not very disagreeable to you."

But Fanny still hung back. She could not endure the idea of it. Why was not Miss Crawford to be applied to as well? Or why had not she rather gone to her own room, as she had felt to be safest, instead of attending the rehearsal at all? She had known it would irritate and distress her; she had known it her duty to keep away. She was properly punished.

"You have only to read the part," said Henry Crawford, with renewed entreaty.

[245]

"And I do believe she can say every word it," added Maria, "for she could put Mrs Ga right the other day in twenty places. Fann am sure you know the part."

Fanny could not say she did not; and as t all persevered, as Edmund repeated his wish, with a look of even fond dependence on good nature, she must yield. She would do best. Everybody was satisfied; and she was to the tremors of a most palpitating heart, w the others prepared to begin.

They did begin; and being too much enga in their own noise to be struck by an [unust noise in the other part of the house, had p ceeded some way, when the door of the room thrown open, and Julia, appearing at it, wit face all aghast, exclaimed, "My father is co He is in the hall at this moment."

CHAPTER XIX.

H OW is the consternation of the party to described? To the greater numbe was a moment of absolute horror. Thomas in the house! All felt the instantance conviction. Not a hope of imposition or mist was harboured anywhere. Julia's looks were [246]

widence of the fact that made it indisputable; and after the first starts and exclamations, not word was spoken for half a minute; each with in altered countenance was looking at some other, and almost each was feeling it a stroke he most unwelcome, most ill-timed, most appallng! Mr. Yates might consider it only as a vexatious interruption for the evening, and Mr Rushworth might imagine it a blessing; but every other heart was sinking under some degree of self-condemnation or undefined alarm, every other heart was suggesting, "What will become of us? what is to be done now?" It was a terrible pause; and terrible to every ear were the corroborating sounds of opening doors and passing footsteps.

Julia was the first to move and speak again. Jealousy and bitterness had been suspended: selfishness was lost in the common cause; but at the moment of her appearance, Frederick, was listening with looks of devotion to Agatha's narrative, and pressing her hand to his heart; and as soon as she could notice this, and see that, in spite of the shock of her words, he still kept his station and retained her sister's hand, her wounded heart swelled again with injury, and looking as red as she had been white before, she turned out of the room, saying, "I need not be afraid of appearing before him."

[247]

Her going roused the rest; and at the sa moment the two brothers stepped forward, f ing the necessity of doing something. A v few words between them were sufficient. " case admitted no difference of opinion; they m go to the drawing-room directly. Maria joi them with the same intent, just then the stou of the three; for the very circumstance which driven Julia away was to her the sweetest s port. Henry Crawford's retaining her hand such a moment, a moment of such peculiar pr and importance, was worth ages of doubt a anxiety. She hailed it as an earnest of the m serious determination, and was equal even to counter her father. They walked off, utte heedless of Mr Rushworth's requested quest of, "Shall I go too? Had not I better go t Will not it be right for me to go too?" but the were no sooner through the door than Her Crawford undertook to answer the anxious quiry, and, encouraging him by all means to I his respects to Sir Thomas without delay, s him after the others with delighted haste.

Fanny was left with only the Crawfords a Mr Yates. She had been quite overlooked her cousins; and as her own opinion of her clai on Sir Thomas's affection was much too hum to give her any idea of classing herself with children, she was glad to remain behind and ga [248] little breathing-time. Her agitation and alarm exceeded all that was endured by the rest, by the ight of a disposition which not even innocence could keep from suffering. She was nearly ainting: all her former habitual dread of her incle was returning, and with it compassion for im and for almost every one of the party on the levelopment before him, with solicitude on Ednund's account indescribable. She had found a eat, where in excessive trembling she was enluring all these fearful thoughts, while the other hree, no longer under any restraint, were givng vent to their feelings of vexation, lamenting over such an unlooked-for premature arrival as most untoward event, and without mercy wishng poor Sir Thomas had been twice as long on is passage, or were still in Antigua.

The Crawfords were more warm on the sublect than Mr Yates, from better understanding the family, and judging more clearly of the misshief that must ensue. The ruin of the play was to them a certainty: they felt the total destruction of the scheme to be inevitably at hand; while Mr. Wates considered it only as a temporary interruption, a disaster for the evening, and could even suggest the possibility of the rehearsal beng renewed after tea, when the bustle of receivng Sir Thomas were over, and he might be at eisure to be amused by it. The Crawfords laughed at the idea; and having soon agreed the propriety of their walking quietly home leaving the family to themselves, proposed Yate's accompanying them and spending evening at the Parsonage. But Mr Yates, I ing never been with those who thought much parental claims, or family confidence, could perceive that anything of the kind was necessa and therefore, thanking them, said, "he prefer remaining where he was, that he might pay respects to the old gentleman handsomely, s he was come; and besides, he did not thin would be fair by the others, to have everyb run away."

[249]

Fanny was just beginning to collect hers and to feel that if she staid longer behind it mis seem disrespectful, when this point was sett and being commissioned with the brother sister's apology, saw them preparing to go she quitted the room herself to perform dreadful duty of appearing before her uncle

Too soon did she find herself at the drawi room door; and after pausing a moment for w she knew would not come, for a courage wh the outside of no door had ever supplied to 1 she turned the lock in desperation, and the lig of the drawing-room, and all the collected fam were before her. As she entered, her own na caught her ear. Sir Thomas was at that mom [250] ooking round him, and saying, "But where is anny? Why do not I see my little Fanny?" -and, on perceiving her, came forward with a indness which astonished and penetrated her, alling her his dear Fanny, kissing her affectiontely, and observing with decided pleasure how nuch she was grown! Fanny knew not how to eel, nor where to look. She was quite opressed. He had never been so kind, so very kind o her in his life. His manner seemed changed, is voice was quick from the agitation of joy; nd all that had been awful in his dignity seemed ost in tenderness. He led her nearer to the light nd looked at her again-inquired particularly fter her health, and then correcting himself, oberved, that he need not inquire, for her appearnce spoke sufficiently on that point. A fine blush aving succeeded the previous paleness of her ace, he was justified in his belief of her equal imrovement in health and beauty. He inquired ext after her family, especially William; and his indness altogether was such as made her reroach herself for loving him so little, and hinking his return a misfortune; and when, n having courage to lift her eyes to his ace, she saw that he was grown thinner, and ad the burnt, fagged, worn look of fatigue and hot climate, every tender feeling was increased, nd she was miserable in considering how much unsuspected vexation was probably ready to burst on him.

[251]

Sir Thomas was indeed the life of the party, who at his sugestion now seated themselves round the fire. He had the best right to be the talker; and the delight of his sensations in being again in his own house, in the centre of his family, after such a separation, made him communicative and chatty in a very unusual degree; and he was ready to give every information as to his voyage, and answer every question of his two sons almost before it was put. His business in Antigua had latterly been prosperously rapid, and he came directly from Liverpool, having had an opportunity of making his passage thither in a private vessel, instead of waiting for the packet; and all the little particulars of his proceedings and events, his arrivals and departures, were most promptly delivered, as he sat by Lady Bertram and looked with heartfelt satisfaction on the faces around him-interrupting himself more than once, however, to remark on his good fortune in finding them all at home-coming unexpectedly as he did-all collected together exactly as he could have wished, but dared not depend on. Mr Rushworth was not forgotten; a most friendly reception and warmth of handshaking had already met him, and with pointed attention he was now included in the objects most intimately connected with Mansfield. There was nothing disagreeable in Mr Rushworth's appearance, and Sir Thomas was liking him already.

[252]

By not one of the circle was he listened to with such unbroken, unalloyed enjoyment as by his wife, who was really extremely happy to see him, and whose feelings were so warmed by his sudden arrival, as to place her nearer agitation than she had been for the last twenty years. She had been almost fluttered for a few minutes, and still remained so sensibly animated as to put away her work, move Pug from her side, and give all her attention and all the rest of her sofa to her husband. She had no anxieties for anybody to cloud her pleasure: her own time had been irreproachably spent during his absence: she had done a great deal of carpet work, and made many yards of fringe; and she would have answered as freely for the good conduct and useful pursuits of all the young people as for her own. It was so agreeable to her to see him again, and hear him talk, to have her ear amused and her whole comprehension filled by his narratives, that she began particularly to feel how dreadfully she must have missed him, and how impossible it would have been for her to bear a lengthened absence.

Mrs Norris was by no means to be compared

[253]

in happiness to her sister. Not that she was incommoded by many fears of Sir Thomas's disapprobation when the present state of his house should be known, for her judgment had been so blinded that, except by the instinctive caution with which she had whisked away Mr Rushworth's pink satin cloak as her brother-in-law entered, she could hardly be said to shew any sign of alarm; but she was vexed by the manner of his return. It had left her nothing to do. Instead of being sent for out of the room, and seeing him first, and having to spread the happy news through the house, Sir Thomas, with a very reasonable dependence, perhaps, on the nerves of his wife and children, had sought no confidant but the butler, and had been following him almost instantaneously into the drawing-room. Mrs Norris felt herself defrauded of an office on which she had always depended, whether his arrival or his death were to be the thing unfolded; and was now trying to be in a bustle without having anything to bustle about, and labouring to be important where nothing was wanted but tranquillity and silence. Would Sir Thomas have consented to eat, she might have gone to the housekeeper with troublesome directions, and insulted the footmen with injunctions of despatch; but Sir Thomas resolutely declined all dinner; he would take nothing, nothing till tea came

[254]

—he would rather wait for tea. Still Mrs Norris was at intervals urging something different; and in the most interesting moment of his passage to England, when the alarm of a French privateer was at the height, she burst through his recital with the proposal of soup. "Sure, my dear Sir Thomas, a basin of soup would be a much better thing for you than tea. Do have a basin of soup."

Sir Thomas could not be provoked. "Still the same anxiety for everybody's comfort, my dear Mrs Norris," was his answer. "But indeed I would rather have nothing but tea."

"Well, then, Lady Bertram, suppose you speak for tea directly; suppose you hurry Baddeley a little; he seems behind hand to-night." She carried this point, and Sir Thomas's narrative proceeded.

At length there was a pause. His immediate communications were exhausted, and it seemed enough to be looking joyfully around him, now at one, now at another of the beloved circle; but the pause was not long: in the elation of her spirits Lady Bertram became talkative, and what were the sensations of her children upon hearing her say, "How do you think the young people have been amusing themselves lately, Sir Thomas? They have been acting. We have been all alive with acting."

[255]

"Indeed! and what have you been acting?" "Oh! they'll tell you all about it."

"The all will soon be told," cried Tom hastily, and with affecting unconcern; "but it is not worth while to bore my father with it now. You will hear enough of it to-morrow, sir. We have just been trying, by way of doing something, and amusing my mother, just within the last week, to get up a few scenes, a mere trifle. We have had such incessant rains almost since October began, that we have been nearly confined to the house for days together. I have hardly taken out a gun since the 3d. Tolerable sport the first three days, but there has been no attempting anything since. The first day I went over Mansfield Wood, and Edmund took the copses beyond Easton, and we brought home six brace between us, and might each have killed six times as many; but we respect your pheasants, sir, I assure you, as much as you could desire. I do not think you will find your woods by any means worse stocked than they were. I never saw Mansfield Wood so full of pheasants in my life as this year. I hope you will take a day's sport there yourself, sir, soon."

For the present the danger was over, and Fanny's sick feelings subsided; but when tea was soon afterwards brought in, and Sir Thomas, getting up, said that he found that he could not be any longer in the house without just looking into his own room, every agitation was returning. He was gone before anything had been said to prepare him for the change he must find there; and a pause of alarm followed his disappearance. Edmund was the first to speak—

[256]

"Something must be done," said he.

"It is time to think of our visitors," said Maria, still feeling her hand pressed to Henry Crawford's heart, and caring little for anything else. "Where did you leave Miss Crawford, Fanny?"

Fanny told of their departure, and delivered their message.

"Then poor Yates is all alone," cried Tom. "I will go and fetch him. He will be no bad assistant when it all comes out."

To the theatre he went, and reached it just in time to witness the first meeting of his father and his friend. Sir Thomas had been a good deal surprised to find candles burning in his room; and on casting his eye round it, to see other symptoms of recent habitation and a general air of confusion in the furniture. The removal of the book-case from before the billiard-room door struck him especially, but he had scarcely more than time to feel astonished at all this, before there were sounds from the billiard-room to astonish him still further. Some one was talking there in a very loud accent; he did not know the voice-more than talking-almost hallooing He stepped to the door, rejoicing at that me ment in having the means of immediate con munication, and, opening it, found himself o the stage of a theatre, and opposed to a rantin young man, who appeared likely to knock hir down backwards. At the very moment of Yate perceiving Sir Thomas, and giving perhaps th very best start he had ever given in the whol course of his rehearsals, Tom Bertram entere at the other end of the room; and never had h found greater difficulty in keeping his coun tenance. His father's looks of solemnity an amazement on this, his first appearance on an stage, and the gradual metamorphosis of the im passioned Baron Wildenheim into the well-bree and easy Mr Yates, making his bow and apolog to Sir Thomas Bertram, was such an exhibition such a piece of true acting, as he would not have lost upon any account. It would be the lastin all probability-the last scene on that stage but he was sure there could not be a finer. The house would close with the greatest eclat.

[257]

There was little time, however, for the indulgence of any images of merriment. It was necessary for him to step forward, too, and assist the introduction, and with many awkward sensations he did his best. Sir Thomas received Mr Yates with all the appearance of cordiality [258] which was due to his own character, but was really as far from pleased with the necessity of the acquaintance as with the manner of its commencement. Mr Yates's family and connections were sufficiently known to him, to render his introduction as the "particular friend," another of the hundred particular friends of his son, exceedingly unwelcome; and it needed all the felicity of being again at home, and all the forbearance it could supply, to save Sir Thomas from anger on finding himself thus bewildered in his own house, making part of a ridiculous exhibition in the midst of theatrical nonsense, and forced in so untoward a moment to admit the acquaintance of a young man whom he felt sure of disapproving, and whose easy indifference and volubility in the course of the first five minutes seeemd to mark him the most at home of the two.

Tom understood his father's thoughts, and heartily wished he might be always as well disposed to give them but partial expression, began to see more clearly than he had ever done before, that there might be some ground of offence, that there might be some reason for the glance his father gave towards the ceiling and stucco of the room; and that when he inquired with mild gravity after the fate of the billiardtable, he was not proceeding beyond a very allowable curiosity. A few minutes were enough for such unsatisfactory sensations on each side; and Sir Thomas having exerted himself so far as to speak a few words of calm approbation in reply to an eager appeal of Mr Yates, as to the happiness of the arrangement, the three gentlemen returned to the drawing-room together, Sir Thomas with an increase of gravity which was not lost on all.

[259]

"I come from your theatre," said he, composedly, as he sat down; "I found myself in it rather unexpectedly. Its vicinity to my own room-but in every respect, indeed, it took me by surprise, as I had not the smallest suspicion of your acting having assumed so serious a character. It appears a neat job, however, as far as I could judge by candlelight, and does my friend Christopher Jackson credit." And then he would have changed the subject, and sipped his coffee in peace over domestic matters of a calmer hue; but Mr Yates, without discernment to catch Sir Thomas's meaning, or diffidence, or delicacy, or discretion enough to allow him to lead the discourse while he mingled among the others with the least obtrusiveness himself, would keep him on the topic of the theatre, would torment him with questions and remarks relative to it, and finally would make him hear the whole history of his disappointment at Ecclesford. [260]

Sir Thomas listened most politely, but found much to offend his ideas of decorum, and confirm his ill opinion of Mr Yates's habits of thinking, from the beginning to the end of the story; and when it was over, could give him no other assurance of sympathy than what a slight bow conveyed.

"This was, in fact, the origin of our acting," said Tom, after a moment's thought. "My friend Yates brought the infection from Ecclesford, and it spread—as those things always spread, you know, sir—the faster, probably from your having so often encouraged the sort of thing in us formerly. It was like treading old ground again."

Mr Yates took the subject from his friend as soon as possible, and immediately gave Sir Thomas an account of what they had done and were doing; told him of the gradual increase of their views, the happy conclusion of their first difficulties, and present promising state of affairs; relating everything with so blind an interest as made him not only totally unconscious of the uneasy movements of many of his friends as they sat, the change of countenance, the fidget, the hem! of unquietness, but prevented him even from seeing the expression of the face on which his own eyes were fixed—from seeing Sir Thomas's dark brow contract as he looked with inquiring earnestness at his daughters and Edmund, dwelling particularly on the latter, and speaking a language, a remonstrance, a reproof, which he felt at his heart. Not less acutely was it felt by Fanny, who had edged back her chair behind her Aunt's end of the sofa and, screened from notice herself, saw all that was passing before her. Such a look of reproach at Edmund from his father she could never have expected to witness; and to feel that it was in any degree deserved was an aggravation indeed. Sir Thomas's look implied, "On your judgment, Edmund, I depended; what have you been about?" She knelt in spirit to her uncle, and her bosom swelled to utter, "Oh, not to him! Look so to all the others, but not to him!"

[261]

Mr Yates was still talking. "To own the truth, Sir Thomas, we were in the middle of a rehearsal when you arrived this evening. We were going through the three first acts, and not unsuccessfully upon the whole. Our company is now so dispersed, from the Crawfords being gone home, that nothing more can be done tonight; but if you will give us the honour of your company to-morrow evening, I should not be afraid of the result. We bespeak your indulgence, you understand, as young performers; we bespeak your indulgence."

"My indulgence shall be given, sir," replied [262] Sir Thomas gravely, "but without any other rehearsal." And with a relenting smile he added, "I come home to be happy and indulgent." Then turning away towards any or all of the rest, he tranquilly said, "Mr and Miss Crawford were mentioned in my last letters from Mansfield. Do you find them agreeable acquaintance?"

Tom was the only one at all ready with an answer, but he being entirely without particular regard for either, without jealousy either in love or acting, could speak very handsomely of both. "Mr Crawford was a most pleasant gentlemanlike man; his sister a sweet, pretty, elegant lively girl."

Mr Rushworth could be silent no longer. "I do not say he is not gentlemanlike, considering; but you should tell your father he is not above five feet eight, or he will be expecting a welllooking man."

Sir Thomas did not quite understand this, and looked with some surprize at the speaker.

"If I must say what I think," continued Mr Rushworth, "in my opinion it is very disagreeable to be always rehearsing. It is having too much of a good thing. I am not so fond of acting as I was at first. I think we are a great deal better employed, sitting comfortably here among ourselves, and doing nothing."

[263]

Sir Thomas looked again, and then replied with an approving smile, "I am happy to find our sentiments on this subject so much the same. It gives me sincere satisfaction. That I should be cautious and quicksighted, and feel many scruples which my children do not feel, is perfectly natural; and equally so that my value for domestic tranquillity, for a home which shuts out noisy pleasures, should much exceed theirs. But at your time of life to feel all this, is a most favourable circumstance for yourself, and for everybody connected with you, and I am sensible of the importance of having an ally of such weight."

Sir Thomas meant to be giving Mr Rushworth's opinion in better words than he could find himself. He was aware that he must not expect a genius in Mr Rushworth; but as a welljudging, steady young man, with better notions than his elocution would do justice to, he intended to value him very highly. It was impossible for many of the others not to smile. Mr Rushworth hardly knew what to do with so much meaning; but by looking, as he really felt, most exceedingly pleased with Sir Thomas's good opinion and saying scarcely anything, he did his best towards preserving that good opinion a little longer.

CHAPTER XX.

DMUND'S first object the next morning was to see his father alone, and give him a fair statement of the whole acting scheme, defending his own share in it as far only as he could then, in a soberer moment, feel his motives to deserve, and acknowledging, with perfect ingenuousness, that his concession had been attended with such partial good as to make his judgment in it very doubtful. He was anxious, while vindicating himself, to say nothing unkind of the others; but there was only one amongst them whose conduct he could mention without some necessity of defence or palliation. "We have all been more or less to blame," said he, "every one of us, excepting Fanny. Fanny is the only one who has judged rightly throughout; who has been consistent. Her feelings have been steadily against it from first to last. You will find Fanny everything you could wish."

Sir Thomas saw all the impropriety of such a scheme among such a party, and at such a time, as strongly as his son had ever supposed he must; he felt it too much, indeed, for many words; and having shaken hands with Edmund, meant to try to lose the disagreeable impression, and forget how much he had been forgotten himself as soon as he could, after the house had been cleared of every object enforcing the remembrance, and restored to its proper state. He did not enter into any remonstrance with his other children: he was more willing to believe they felt their error, than to run the risk of investigation. The reproof of an immediate conclusion of everything, the sweep of every preparation, would be sufficient.

[265]

There was one person, however, in the house, whom he could not leave to learn his sentiments merely through his conduct. He could not help giving Mrs Norris a hint of his having hoped, that her advice might have been interposed to prevent what her judgment must certainly have disapproved. The young people had been very inconsiderate in forming the plan; they ought to have been capable of a better decision themselves; but they were young; and, excepting Edmund, he believed, of unsteady characters; and with greater surprize, therefore, he must regard her acquiescence in the wrong measures, her countenance of their unsafe amusements, than that such measures and such amusements should have been suggested. Mrs Norris was a little confounded and as nearly being silenced as ever she had been in her life; for she was ashamed to confess having never seen any of the impropriety which was so glaring to Sir Thomas, [266]

He could not help giving Mrs. Norris a hint that her advice might have been interposed and would not have admitted that her influence was insufficient-that she might have talked in vain. Her only resource was to get out of the subject as fast as possible, and turn the current of Sir Thomas's ideas into a happier channel. She had a great deal to insinuate in her own praise as to general attention to the interest and comfort of his family, much exertion and many sacrifices to glance at in the form of hurried walks and sudden removals from her own fireside, and many excellent hints of distrust and economy to Lady Bertram and Edmund to detail, whereby a most considerable saving had always arisen, and more than one bad servant been detected. But her chief strength lay in Sotherton. Her greatest support and glory was in having formed the connection with the Rushworths. There she was impregnable. She took to herself all the credit of bringing Mr Rushworth's admiration of Maria to any effect. "If I had not been active," said she, "and made a point of being introduced to his mother, and then prevailed on my sister to pay the first visit, I am as certain as I sit here that nothing would have come of it; for Mr Rushworth is the sort of amiable modest young man who want a great deal of encouragement and there were girls enough on the catch for him if we had been idle. But I left no stone unturned. I was ready to move heaven and earth to persuade my sister, and at last I did persuade her. You know the distance to Sotherton; it was in the middle of winter, and the roads almost impassable, but I did persuade her."

[267]

"I know how great, how justly great, your influence is with Lady Bertram and her children, and am the more concerned that it should not have been—"

"My dear Sir Thomas, if you had seen the state of the roads that day! I thought we should never have got through them, though we had the four horses of course; and poor old coachman would attend us, out of his great love and kindness, though he was hardly able to sit the box on account of the rheumatism which I had been doctoring him for ever since Michaelmas. I cured him at last; but he was very bad all winter -and this was such a day, I could not help going to him up in his room before we set off to advise him not to venture: he was putting on his wig; so I said, 'Coachman, you had much better not go; your Lady and I shall be very safe; you know how steady Stephen is, and Charles has been upon the leaders so often now, that I am sure there is no fear.' But, however, I soon found it would not do; he was bent upon going, and as I hate to be worrying and officious, I said no more; but my heart quite ached for him at [268] every jolt, and when we got into the rough lanes about Stoke, where, what with frost and snow upon beds of stones, it was worse than anything you can imagine, I was quite in an agony about him. And then the poor horses too! To see them straining away! You know how I always feel for the horses. And when we got to the bottom of Sandcroft Hill, what do you think I did? You will laugh at me; but I got out and walked up. I did indeed. It might not be saving them much, but it was something, and I could not bear to sit at my ease, and be dragged up at the expense of those noble animals. I caught a dreadful cold, but that I did not regard. My object was accomplished in the visit."

"I hope we shall always think the acquaintance worth any trouble that might be taken to establish it. There is nothing very striking in Mr Rushworth's manners, but I was pleased last night with what appeared to be his opinion on one subject; his decided preference of a quiet family party to the bustle and confusion of acting. He seemed to feel exactly as one could wish."

"Yes, indeed, and the more you know of him the better you will like him. He is not a shining character, but he has a thousand good qualities; and is so disposed to look up to you, that I am quite laughed at about it, for everybody considers it as my doing. 'Upon my word, Mrs Norris,' said Mrs Grant, the other day, 'if Mr Rushworth were a son of your own, he could not hold Sir Thomas in greater respect.' "

[269]

Sir Thomas gave up the point, foiled by her evasions, disarmed by her flattery; and was obliged to rest satisfied with the conviction that where the present pleasure of those she loved was at stake, her kindness did sometimes overpower her judgment.

It was a busy morning with him. Conversation with any of them occupied but a small part of it. He had to reinstate himself in all the wonted concerns of his Mansfield life; to see his steward and his bailiff; to examine and compute, and, in the intervals of business, to walk into his stables and his gardens, and nearest plantations: but active and methodical, he had not only done all this before he resumed his seat as master of the house at dinner, he had also set the carpenter to work in pulling down what had been so lately put up in the billiard-room, and given the scene-painter his dismissal, long enough to justify the pleasing belief of his being then at least as far off as Northampton. The scene-painter was gone, having spoilt only the floor of one room, ruined all the coachman's sponges, and made five of the under servants idle and dissatisfied; and Sir Thomas was in hopes that another day or two would suffice to wipe away every outward memento of what had been, even to the destruction of every unbound copy of "Lover's Vows" in the house, for he was burning all that met his eye.

[270]

Mr Yates was beginning now to understand Sir Thomas's intentions, though as far as ever from understanding their source. He and his friend had been out with their guns the chief of the morning, and Tom had taken the oportunity of explaining, what was to be expected. Mr Yates felt it as acutely as might be supposed. To be a second time disappointed in the same way was an instance of severe ill luck; and his indignation was such, that had it not been for delicacy towards his friend, and his friend's youngest sister, he believed he should certainly attack the baronet on the absurdity of his proceedings, and urge him into a little more rationality. He believed this very stoutly while he was in Mansfield Wood, and all the way home; but there was a something in Sir Thomas, when they sat round the same table, which made Mr Yates think it wiser to let him pursue his own way, and feel the folly of it without opposition. He had known many disagreeable fathers before, and often been struck with the inconveniences they occasioned, but never, in the whole course of his life, had he seen one of that class, so unintelligibly moral, so infamously tyrannical as Sir Thomas. He was not a man to be endured but for his children's sake, and he might be thankful to his fair daughter Julia that Mr Yates did yet mean to stay a few days longer under his roof.

[271]

The evening passed with external smoothness though almost every mind was ruffled; and the music which Sir Thomas called for from his daughters helped to conceal the want of rea harmony. Maria was in a good deal of agitation. It was of the utmost consequence to her that Crawford should now lose no time in declaring himself, and she was disturbed that ever a day should be gone by without seeming to advance that point. She had been expecting to see him the whole morning, and all the evening too, was still expecting him. Mr Rushworth had set off early with the great news for Sotherton; and she had fondly hoped for such an immediate eclaircissement as might save him the trouble of ever coming back again. But they had seen no one from the Parsonage, not a creature, and had heard no tidings beyond a friendly note of congratulation and inquiry from Mrs Grant to Lady Bertram. It was the first day for many, many weeks, in which the families had been wholly divided. Four-and-twenty hours had never passed before, since August be gan, without bringing them together in some way [272] or other. It was a sad anxious day; and the morrow, though differing in the sort of evil, did by no means bring less. A few moments of feverish enjoyment were followed by hours of acute suffering. Henry Crawford was again in the house: he walked up with Dr Grant, who was anxious to pay his respects to Sir Thomas, and at rather an early hour they were ushered into the breakfast room, where were most of the family. Sir Thomas soon appeared, and Maria saw with delight and agitation the introduction of the man she loved to her father. Her sensations were indefinable, and so were they a few minutes afterwards upon hearing Henry Crawford, who had a chair between herself and Tom, ask the latter in an under voice, whether there were any plans for resuming the play after the present happy interruption (with a courteous glance at Sir Thomas), because, in that case, he should make a point of returning to Mansfield at any time required by the party: he was going away immediately, being to meet his uncle at Bath without delay: but if there were any prospect of a renewal of "Lovers' Vows," he should hold himself positively engaged, he should break through every other claim; he should absolutely condition with his uncle for attending them whenever he might be wanted. The play should not be lost by his absence.

[273]

"From Bath, Norfolk, London, York; wherever I may be," said he: "I will attend you from any place in England, at an hour's notice."

It was well at that moment that Tom had to speak and not his sister. He could immediately say with easy fluency, "I am sorry you are going but as to our play, that is all over—entirely a an end—(looking significantly at his father) The painter was sent off yesterday, and very little will remain of the theatre to-morrow. I knew how that would be from the first. It is early for Bath. You will find nobody there.'

"It is about my uncle's usual time."

"When do you think of going?"

"I may, perhaps, get as far as Banbury to day."

"Whose stables do you use at Bath?" was th next question; and while this branch of the sub ject was under discussion, Maria, who wanted neither pride nor resolution, was preparing t encounter her share of it with tolerable calmness

To her he soon turned, repeating much of what he had already said, with only a softened air and stronger expressions of regret. But what availe his expressions or his air? He was going and, if not voluntarily going, voluntarily in tending to stay away; for, excepting what migh be due to his uncle, his engagements were a self-imposed. He might talk of necessity, but [274]

she knew his independence. The hand which had so pressed her's to his heart! the hand and the heart were alike motionless and passive now! Her spirit supported her, but the agony of her mind was severe. She had not long to endure what arose from listening to language which his actions contradicted, or to bury the tumult of her feelings under the restraint of society; for general civilities soon called his notice from her, and the farewell visit, as it then became openly acknowledged, was a very short one. He was gone-he had touched her hand for the last time, he had made his parting bow, and she might seek directly all that solitude could do for her. Henry Crawford was gone, gone from the house, and within two hours afterwards from the parish; and so ended all the hopes his selfish vanity had raised in Maria and Julia Bertram.

Julia could rejoice that he was gone. His presence was beginning to be odious to her; and if Maria gained him not, she was now cool enough to dispense with any other revenge. She did not want exposure to be added to desertion. Henry Crawford gone, she could even pity her sister.

With a purer spirit did Fanny rejoice in the intelligence. She heard it at dinner, and felt it a blessing. By all the others it was mentioned with regret; and his merits honoured with due gradation of feeling, from the sincerity of

[275]

Edmund's too partial regard, to the unconcern of his mother speaking entirely by rote. Mr Noris began to look about her, and wonder tha his falling in love with Julia had come to nothing and could almost fear that she had been remis herself in forwarding it; but with so many to care for, how was it possible for even her activity to keep pace with her wishes?

Another day or two, and Mr Yates was gond likewise. In his departure Sir Thomas felt th chief interest; wanting to be alone with his fam ily, the presence of a stranger superior to M Yates must have been irksome; but of him, tri fling and confident, idle and expensive, it wa every way vexatious. In himself he was weari some, but as the friend of Tom and the admire of Julia became offensive. Sir Thomas had been quite indifferent to Mr Crawford's going or staying; but his good wishes for Mr Yates' having a pleasant journey, as he walked with him to the hall door, were given with genuin satisfaction. Mr Yates had staid to see the de struction of every theatrical preparation a Mansfield, the removal of everything appertain ing to the play; he left the house in all the sober ness of its general character; and Sir Thoma hoped, in seeing him out of it, to be rid of the worst object connected with the scheme, and the last that must be inevitably reminding him of it. existence.

[276]

Mrs Norris contrived to remove one article from his sight that might have distressed him. The curtain over which she had presided with such talent and such success, went off with her to her cottage, where she happened to be particularly in want of green baize.

CHAPTER XXI.

SIR THOMAS'S return made a striking change in the ways of the family, independent of Lover's Vows. Under his government, Mansfield was an altered place. Some members of their society sent away, and the spirits of many others saddened—it was all sameness and gloom compared with the past—a sombre family party rarely enlivened. There was little intercourse with the Parsonage. Sir Thomas, drawing back from intimacies in general, was particularly disinclined, at this time, for any engagements but in one quarter. The Rushworths were the only addition to his own domestic circle which he could solicit.

Edmund did not wonder that such should be his father's feelings, nor could he regret anything but the exclusion of the Grants. "But they," he observed to Fanny, "have a claim. They seem to belong to us; they seem to be part ourselves. I could wish my father were mo sensible of their very great attention to r mother and sisters while he was away. I a afraid they may feel themselves neglected. B the truth is, that my father hardly knows the They had not been here a twelvemonth wh he left England. If he knew them better, would value their society as it deserves; for th are in fact exactly the sort of people he wou like. We are sometimes a little in want of an mation among ourselves: my sisters seem out spirits, and Tom is certainly not at his ease. I and Mrs Grant would enliven us, and make o evenings pass away with more enjoyment even to my father."

[277]

"Do you think so?" said Fanny: "in my opinion, my uncle would not like any addition. think he values the very quietness you speak of and that the repose of his own family circle all he wants. And it does not appear to me think we are more serious than we used to be—I mean before my uncle went abroad. As well as can recollect, it was always much the same There was never much laughing in his presence or, if there is any difference it is not more think than such an absence has a tendency to produce at first. There must be a sort of shyness but I cannot recollect that our evenings former: [278] were ever merry, except when my uncle was in town. No young people's are, I suppose, when those they look up to are at home."

"I believe you are right, Fanny," was his reply, after a short consideration. "I believe our evenings are rather returned to what they were, than assuming a new character. The novelty was in their being lively. Yet, how strong the impression that only a few weeks will give! I have been feeling as if we had never lived so before."

"I suppose I am graver than other people," said Fanny. "The evenings do not appear long to me. I love to hear my uncle talk of the West Indies. I could listen to him for an hour together. It entertains me more than many other things have done; but then I am unlike other people, I dare say."

"Why should you dare say that?" (smiling). "Do you want to be told that you are unlike other people in being more wise and discreet? But when did you, or anybody, ever get a compliment from me, Fanny? Go to my father if you want to be complimented. He will satisfy you. Ask your uncle what he thinks, and you will hear compliments enough: and though they may be chiefly on your person, you must put up with it, and trust to his seeing as much beauty of mind in time."

Such language was so new to Fanny that quite embarrassed her.

"Your uncle thinks you very pretty, de Fanny—and that is the long and the short the matter. Anybody but myself would ha made something more of it, and anybody b you would resent that you had not been thoug very pretty before; but the truth is, that your u cle never did admire you till now—and now does. Your complexion is so improved!—an you have gained so much countenance!—an your figure—nay, Fanny, do not turn awa about it—it is but an uncle. If you cannot be an uncle's admiration, what is to become of you You must really begin to harden yourself to t idea of being worth looking at. You must t not to mind growing up into a pretty woman

"Oh! don't talk so, don't talk so," cried Fann distressed by more feelings than he was aware of but seeing that she was distressed, he had don with the subject, and only added more seriou ly,—

"Your uncle is disposed to be pleased wi you in every respect; and I only wish you wou talk to him more. You are one of those who a too silent in the evening circle."

"But I do talk to him more than I used. am sure I do. Did not you hear me ask him about the slave-trade last night?"

[280]

"I did—and was in hopes the question would be followed up by others. It would have pleased your uncle to be inquired of farther."

"And I longed to do it—but there was such a dead silence! And while my cousins were sitting by without speaking a word, or seeming at all interested in the subject, I did not like—I thought it would appear as if I wanted to set myself off at their expense, by shewing a curiosity and pleasure in his information which he must wish his own daughters to feel."

"Miss Crawford was very right in what she said of you the other day: that you seemed almost as fearful of notice and praise as other women were of neglect. We were talking of you at the Parsonage, and those were her words. She has great discernment. I know nobody who distinguishes characters better. For so young a woman, it is remarkable! She certainly understands you better than you are understood by the greater part of those who have known you so long; and with regard to some others, I can perceive, from occasional lively hints, the unguarded expressions of the moment, that she could define many as accurately, did not delicacy forbid it. I wonder what she thinks of my father! She must admire him as a fine-looking man, with most gentlemanlike, dignified, consistent manners; but, perhaps, having seen him [281]

so seldom, his reserve may be a little repulsi Could they be much together, I feel sure of th liking each other. He would enjoy her live ness and she has talents to value his powers. wish they met more frequently! I hope s does not suppose there is any dislike on his side

"She must know herself too secure of the r gard of all the rest of you," said Fanny, wi half a sigh, "to have any such apprehensic And Sir Thomas's wishing just at first to only with his family, is so very natural, that s can argue nothing from that. After a litt while I dare say we shall be meeting again in t same sort of way, allowing for the difference of the time of year."

"This is the first October that she has pass in the country since her infancy. I do not ca Tunbridge or Cheltenham the country; and N vember is a still more serious month, and I ca see that Mrs Grant is very anxious for her m finding Mansfield dull as winter comes on."

Fanny could have said a great deal, but it we safer to say nothing, and leave untouched a Miss Crawford's resources, her accomplishment her spirits, her importance, her friends, lest should betray her into any observations seen ingly unhandsome. Miss Crawford's kind opiion of herself deserved at least a grateful forbea ance, and she began to talk of something else.

[282]

"To-morrow, I think, my uncle dines at Sotherton, and you and Mr Bertram too. We shall be quite a small party at home. I hope my uncle may continue to like Mr Rushworth."

"That is impossible, Fanny. He must like him less after to-morrow's visit, for we shall be five hours in his company. I should dread the stupidity of the day, if there were not a much greater evil to follow—the impression it must leave on Sir Thomas. He cannot much longer deceive himself. I am sorry for them all, and would give something that Rushworth and Maria had never met."

In this quarter, indeed, disappointment was impending over Sir Thomas. Not all his goodwill for Mr Rushworth, not all Mr Rushworth's deference for him, could prevent him from soon discerning some part of the truth—that Mr Rushworth was an inferior young man, as ignorant in business as in books, with opinions in general unfixed, and without seeming much aware of it himself.

He had expected a very different son-in-law; and beginning to feel grave on Maria's account, tried to understand her feelings. Little observation there was necessary to tell him that indifference was the most favourable state they could be in. Her behaviour to Mr Rushworth was careless and cold. She could not, did not like him. Sir Thomas resolved to speak set ously to her. Advantageous as would be the a liance, and long standing and public as was the engagement, her happiness must not be sace ficed to it. Mr Rushworth had, perhaps, bee accepted on too short an acquaintance, and, o knowing him better, she was repenting.

[283]

With solemn kindness Sir Thomas addresse her; told her his fears, inquired into her wish entreated her to be open and sincere, and assure her that every inconvenience should be brave and the connection entirely given up, if she fe herself unhappy in the prospect of it. He would act for her and release her. Maria had a me ment's struggle as she listened, and only a me ment's; when her father ceased, she was able t give her answer immediately, decidedly, and wit no apparent agitation. She thanked him for h great attention, his paternal kindness, but h was quite mistaken in supposing she had th smallest desire of breaking through her engage ment, or was sensible of any change of opinio or inclination since her forming it. She had th highest esteem for Mr Rushworth's characte and disposition, and could not have a doubt of her happiness with him.

Sir Thomas was satisfied; too glad to be satisfied, perhaps, to urge the matter quite so far a his judgment might have dictated to others. I was an alliance which he could not have relinquished without pain; and thus he reasoned. Mr Rushworth was young enough to improve. Mr Rushworth must and would improve in good society; and if Maria could now speak so securely of her happiness with him, speaking certainly without the prejudice, the blindness of love, she ought to be believed. Her feelings, probably, were not acute; he had never supposed them to be so; but her comforts might not be less on that account; and if she could dispense with seeing her husband a leading, shining character, there would certainly be everything else in her favour. A well-disposed young woman, who did not marry for love, was in general but the more attached to her own family; and the nearness of Sotherton to Mansfield must naturally hold out the greatest temptation, and would, in all probability, be a continual supply of the most amiable and innocent enjoyments. Such and such-like were the reasonings of Sir Thomas, happy to escape the embarrassing evils of a rupture, the wonder, the reflections, the reproach that must attend it; happy to secure a marriage which would bring him such an addition of respectability and influence, and very happy to think anything of his daughter's disposition that was most favourable for the purpose.

[284]

To her the conference closed as satisfactorily as to him. She was in a state of mind to be gla that she had secured her fate beyond recall; th she had pledged herself anew to Sotherton; th she was safe from the possibility of giving Crav ford the triumph of governing her actions, an destroying her prospects; and retired in prov resolve, determined only to behave more caution ly to Mr Rushworth in future, that her fath might not be again suspecting her.

Had Sir Thomas applied to his daughter with in the first three or four days after Henry Crar ford's leaving Mansfield, before her feelin were at all tranquillised, before she had give up every hope of him, or absolutely resolved of enduring his rival, her answer might have be different; but after another three or four day when there was no return, no letter, no messag no symptom of a softened heart, no hope advantage from separation, her mind becar cool enough to seek all the comfort that priand self-revenge could give.

Henry Crawford had destroyed her happing but he should not know that he had done it; should not destroy her credit, her appearance her prosperity, too. He should not have to this of her as pining in the retirement of Mansfie for him, rejecting Sotherton and London, ind pendence and splendour, for his sake. Independence was more needful than ever; the want it at Mansfield more sensibly felt. She was less and less able to endure the restraint which her father imposed. The liberty which his absence had given was now become absolutely necessary. She must escape from him and Mansfield as soon as possible, and find consolation in fortune and consequence, bustle and the world, for a wounded spirit. Her mind was quite determined, and varied not.

[286]

To such feelings delay, even the delay of much preparation, would have been an evil, and Mr Rushworth could hardly be more impatient for the marriage than herself. In all the important preparations of the mind she was complete: being prepared for matrimony by an hatred of home, restraint, and tranquillity; by the misery of disappointed affection, and contempt of the man she was to marry. The rest might wait. The preparations of new carriages and furniture might wait for London and spring, when her own taste could have fairer play.

The principals being all agreed in this respect, it soon appeared that a very few weeks would be sufficient for such arrangements as must precede the wedding.

Mrs Rushworth was quite ready to retire, and make way for the fortunate young woman her dear son had selected; and very early in November removed herself, her maid, her footman, and her chariot, with true dowager propriety, to Bat there to parade over the wonders of Sothert in her evenings parties; enjoying them as the oughly, perhaps, in the animation of a car table as she had ever done on the spot; and b fore the middle of the same month the ceremon had taken place which gave Sotherton anoth mistress.

[287]

It was a very proper wedding. The brid was elegantly dressed; the two bridesmaids we duly inferior; her father gave her away; h mother stood with salts in her hand, expectin to be agitated; her aunt tried to cry; and the se vice was impressively read by Dr Grant. Not ing could be objected to when it came under the discussion of the neighbourhood, except that the carriage which conveyed the bride and bride groom and Julia from the church door to Sother ton was the same chaise which Mr Rushworth has used for a twelvemonth before. In everythin else the etiquette of the day might stand the strictest investigation.

It was done, and they were gone. Sir Thom felt as an anxious father must feel, and was if deed experiencing much of the agitation while his wife had been apprehensive of for hersel but had fortunately escaped. Mrs Norris, mo happy to assist in the duties of the day, by spening it at the Park to support her sister's spirit [288] and drinking the health of Mr and Mrs Rushworth in a supernumerary glass or two, was all joyous delight; for she had made the match; she had done everything; and no one would have supposed, from her confident triumph, that she had ever heard of conjugal infelicity in her life, or could have the smallest insight into the disposition of the neice who had been brought up under her eye.

The plan of the young couple was to proceed, after a few days, to Brighton, and take a house there for some weeks. Every public place was new to Maria, and Brighton is almost as gay in winter as in summer. When the novelty of amusement there was over, [it] would be time for the wider range of London.

Julia was to go with them to Brighton. Since rivalry between the sisters had ceased, they had been gradually recovering much of their former good understanding; and were at least sufficiently friends to make each of them exceedingly glad to be with the other at such a time. Some other companion than Mr Rushworth was of the first consequence to his lady; and Julia was quite as eager for novelty and pleasure as Maria, though she might not have struggled through so much to obtain them, and could better bear a subordinate situation.

Their departure made another material change

[289]

at Mansfield, a chasm which required some tin to fill up. The family circle became great contracted; and though the Miss Bertrams h latterly added little to its gaiety, they could n but be missed. Even their mother missed ther and how much more their tender-hearted cousi who wandered about the house, and thought them, and felt for them, with a degree of affectionate regret which they had never done muto deserve!

CHAPTER XXII.

FANNY'S consequence increased on the d parture of her cousins. Becoming, as si then did, the only young woman in the drawing-room, the only occupier of that interest ing division of a family in which she had hither held so humble a third, it was impossible for h not to be more looked at, more thought of an attended to, than she had ever been before; an "where is Fanny?" became no uncommon que tion, even without her being wanted for any one convenience.

Not only at home did her value increase, but at the Parsonage too. In that house which shad hardly entered twice a year since Mr Norrisi death, she became a welcome, an invited guess [290] and in the gloom and dirt of a November day, most acceptable to Mary Crawford. Her visits there, beginning by chance, were continued by solicitation. Mrs Grant, really eager to get any change for her sister, could, by the easiest self-deceit, persuade herself that she was doing the kindest thing by Fanny, and giving her the most important opportunities of improvement in pressing her frequent calls.

Fanny, having been sent into the village on some errand by her aunt Norris, was overtaken by a heavy shower close to the Parsonage; and being descried from one of the windows endeavouring to find shelter under the branches and lingering leaves of an oak just beyond their premises, was forced, though not without some modest reluctance on her part, to come in. A civil servant she had withstood; but when Dr Grant himself went out with an umbrella, there was nothing to be done but to be very much ashamed, and to get into the house as fast as possible; and to poor Miss Crawford, who had just been contemplating the dismal rain in a very desponding state of mind, sighing over the ruin of all her plan of exercise for that morning, and of every chance of seeing a single creature beyond themselves for the next twenty-four hours, the sound of a little bustle at the front door, and the sight of Miss Price dripping with wet in the vestibule, was delightful. The value of an event of a wet day in the country was most forcible brought before her. She was all alive again directly, and among the most active in being use ful to Fanny, in detecting her to be wetter that she would at first allow, and providing her with dry clothes; and Fanny, after being obliged to submit to all this attention, and to being assisted and waited on by mistresses and maids, being a so obliged, on returning down stairs, to be fixed in their drawing-room for an hour while the rain continued, the blessing of something fresh to see and think of was thus extended to Miss Craw ford, and might carry on her spirits to the period of dressing and dinner.

[291]

The two sisters were so kind to her, and so pleasant, that Fanny might have enjoyed her visit could she have believed herself not in the way, and could she have foreseen that the weather would certainly clear at the end of the hour, and save her from the shame of having Dr Grant carriage and horses out to take her home, with which she was threatened. As to anxiety for and alarm that her absence in such weather might on casion at home, she had nothing to suffer on that score; for as her being out was known only ther two aunts, she was perfectly aware that nonwould be felt, and that in whatever cottage aun Norris might chuse to establish her during th [292] rain, her being in such cottage would be indubitable to aunt Bertram.

Dr. Grant himself went out with an umbrella

It was beginning to look brighter, when Fanny, observing a harp in the room, asked some questions about it, which soon led to an acknowledgment of her wishing very much to hear it, and a confession, which could hardly be believed, of her having never yet heard it since its being in Mansfield. To Fanny herself it appeared a very simple and natural circumstance. She had scarcely ever been at the Parsonage since the instrument's arrival, there had been no reason that she should; but Miss Crawford, calling to mind an early expressed wish on the subject, was concerned at her own neglect; and "shall I play to you now?" and "what will you have?" were questions immediately following with the readiest good humour.

She played accordingly; happy to have a new listener, and a listener who seemed so much obliged, so full of wonder at the performance, and who shewed herself not wanting in taste. She played till Fanny's eyes, straying to the window on the weather's being evidently fair, spoke what she felt must be done.

"Another quarter of an hour," said Miss Crawford, "and we shall see how it will be. Do not run away the first moment of its holding up. Those clouds look alarming."

[293]

"But they are passed over," said Fanny. "I have been watching them. This weather is all from the south."

"South or north, I know a black cloud when I see it; and you must not set forward while it is so threatening. And besides I want to play something more to you—a very pretty piece and your cousin Edmund's prime favourite. You must stay and hear your cousin's favourite."

Fanny felt that she must; and though she had not waited for that sentence to be thinking of Edmund, such a memento made her particularly awake to his idea, and she fancied him sitting in that room again and again, perhaps in the very spot where she sat now, listening with constant delight to the favourite air, played, as it appeared to her, with superior tone and expression; and though pleased with it herself, and glad to like whatever was liked by him, she was more sincerely impatient to go away at the conclusion of it than she had been before; and on this being evident, she was so kindly asked to call again, to take them in her walk whenever she could, to come and hear more of the harp, that she felt it necessary to be done, if no objection arose at home.

Such was the origin of the sort of intimacy which took place between them within the first fortnight after the Miss Bertrams' going away—an intimacy resulting principally from Miss Crawford's desire of something new, and which had little reality in Fanny's feelings. Fanny went to her every two or three days: it seemed a kind of fascination: she could not be easy without going, and yet it was without loving her, without ever thinking like her, without any sense of obligation for being sought after now when nobody else was to be had; and deriving no higher pleasure from her conversation than occasional amusement, and that often at the expense of her judgment, when it was raised by pleasantry on people or subjects which she wished to be respected. She went, however, and they sauntered about together many an half hour in Mrs Grant's shrubbery, the weather being unusually mild for the time of year, and venturing sometimes even to sit down on one of the benches now comparatively unsheltered, remaining there perhaps till, in the midst of some tender ejaculation of Fanny's, on the sweets of so protracted an autumn, they were forced by the sudden swell of a cold gust shaking down the last few yellow leaves about them, to jump up and walk for warmth.

[294]

"This is pretty, very pretty," said Fanny, looking around her as they were thus sitting together one day; "every time 1 come into this shrubbery I am more struck with its growth and beauty.

Three years ago, this was nothing but a rough hedgerow along the upper side of the field, never thought of as anything, or capable of becoming anything; and now it is converted into a walk, and it would be difficult to say whether most valuable as a convenience or an ornament; and perhaps, in another three years we may be forgetting-almost forgetting what it was before. How wonderful, how very wonderful the operations of time, and the changes of the human mind!" And following the latter train of thought, she soon afterwards added: "If any one faculty of our nature may be called more wonderful than the rest, I do think it is memory. There seems something more speakingly incomprehensible in the powers, the failure, the inequalities of memory, than in any other of our intelligences. The memory is sometimes so retentive, so serviceable, so obedient: at others, so bewildered and so weak; and at others again, so tyrannic so beyond control! We are, to be sure a miracle every way; but our powers of recollecting and of forgetting do seem peculiarly past finding out."

Miss Crawford, untouched and inattentive, had nothing to say; and Fanny, perceiving it, brought back her own mind to what she thought must interest.

"It may seem impertinent in me to praise, but [296]

I must admire the taste Mrs Grant has shewn in all this. There is such a quiet simplicity in the plan of the walk! Not too much attempted!"

"Yes," replied Miss Crawford, carelessly, "it does very well for a place of this sort. One does not think of extent here; and between ourselves, till I came to Mansfield, I had not imagined a country parson ever aspired to a shrubbery, or anything of the kind."

"I am so glad to see the evergreens thrive!" said Fanny, in reply. "My uncle's gardener always says the soil here is better than his own, and so it appears from the growth of the laurels and evergreens in general. The evergreen! How beautiful, how welcome, how wonderful the evergreen! When one thinks of it, how astonishing a variety of nature! In some countries we know the tree that sheds its leaf is the variety, but that does not make it less amazing, that the same soil and the same sun should nurture plants differing in the first rule and law of their existence. You will think me rhapsodizing; but when I am out of doors, especially when I am sitting out of doors, I am very apt to get into this sort of wondering strain. One cannot fix one's eyes on the commonest natural production without finding food for a rambling fancy."

"To say the truth," replied Miss Crawford, "I am something like the famous Doge at the [297] court of Lewis XIV.; and may declare that I see no wonder in this shrubbery equal to seeing myself in it. If anybody had told me a year ago that this place would be my home, that I should be spending month after month here, as I have done, I certainly should not have believed them. I have now been here nearly five months; and, moreover, the quietest five months I ever passed."

"Too quiet for you, I believe."

"I should have thought so theoretically myself, but," and her eyes brightened as she spoke, "take it all and all, I never spent so happy a summer. But then," with a more thoughtful air and lowered voice, "there is no saying what it may lead to."

Fanny's heart beat quick, and she felt quite unequal to surmizing or soliciting anything more. Miss Crawford, however, with renewed animation, soon went on:—

"I am conscious of being far better reconciled to a country residence than I had ever expected to be. I can even suppose it pleasant to spend half the year in the country, under certain circumstances, very pleasant. An elegant, moderate sized house in the centre of family connections; continual engagements among them; commanding the first society in the neighbourhood; looked-up to, perhaps, as leading it even more than those of larger fortune, and turning from the cheerful round of such amusements to nothing worse than a tête-à-tête with the person one feels most agreeable in the world. There is nothing frightful in such a picture, is there, Miss Price? One need not envy the new Mrs Rushworth with such a home as that." "Envy Mrs Rushworth!" was all that Fanny attempted to say. "Come, come, it would be very unhandsome in us to be severe on Mrs Rushworth, for I look forward to our owing her a great many gay, brilliant, happy hours. I expect we shall be all very much at Sotherton another year. Such a match as Miss Bertram has made is a public blessing; for the first pleasures of Mr Rushworth's wife must be to fill her house, and give the best balls in the country."

[298]

Fanny was silent, and Miss Crawford relapsed into thoughtfulness, till suddenly looking up at the end of a few minutes, she exclaimed, "Ah! here he is." It was not Mr Rushworth, however, but Edmund, who then appeared walking towards them with Mrs Grant. "My sister and Mr Bertram. I am so glad your eldest cousin is gone, that he may be Mr Bertram again. There is something in the sound of Mr Edmund Bertram so formal, so pitiful, so younger-brother-like, that I detest it."

"How differently we feel!" cried Fanny." To me, the sound of Mr Bertram is so cold and noth ing-meaning, so entirely without warmth or char acter! It just stands for gentleman, and that' all. But there is nobleness in the name of Edmund. It is a name of heroism and renown of kings, princes, and knights; and seems to breathe the spirit of chivalry and warm af fections."

[299]

"I grant you the name is good in itself, and Lord Edmund or Sir Edmund sound delightful ly; but sink it under the chill, the annihilation of a Mr and Mr Edmund is no more than Mr John or Mr Thomas. Well, shall we join and disap point them of half their lecture upon sitting down out of doors at this time of year, by being up before they can begin?"

Edmund met them with particular pleasure It was the first time of his seeing them together since the beginning of that better acquaintance which he had been hearing of with great satis faction. A friendship between two so very dear to him was exactly what he could have wished: and to the credit of the lover's under standing, be it stated, that he did not by an means consider Fanny as the only, or even a the greater gainer by such a friendship.

"Well," said Miss Crawford, "and do you no scold us for our imprudence? What do you think we have been sitting down for but to b talked to about it, and entreated and supplicated never to do so again?"

[300]

"Perhaps I might have scolded," said Edmund, "if either of you had been sitting down alone; but while you do wrong together, I can overlook a great deal."

"They cannot have been sitting long," cried Mrs Grant, "for when I went up for my shawl I saw them from the staircase window, and then they were walking."

"And really," added Edmund, "the day is so mild, that your sitting down for a few minutes can be hardly thought imprudent. Our weather must not always be judged by the calendar. We may sometimes take greater liberties in November than in May."

"Upon my word," cried Miss Crawford, "you are two of the most disappointing and unfeeling kind friends I ever met with! There is no giving you a moment's uneasiness. You do not know how much we have been suffering, nor what chills we have felt! But I have long thought Mr Bertram one of the worst subjects to work on, in any little manoeuvre against common sense, that a woman could be plagued with. I had very little hope of him from the first; but you, Mrs Grant, my sister, my own sister, I think I had a right to alarm you a little."

"Do not flatter yourself, my dearest Mary. [301]

You have not the smallest chance of moving me I have my alarms, but they are quite in a differ ent quarter; and if I could have altered th weather, you would have had a good sharp eas wind blowing on you the whole time-for her are some of my plants which Robert will leav out because the nights are so mild, and I know the end of it will be, that we shall have a sudder change of weather, a hard frost setting in al at once, taking everybody (at least Robert) by surprize, and I shall lose every one; and what is worse, cook has just been telling me that tur key, which I particularly wished not to be dressed till Sunday, because I know how much more D Grant would enjoy it on Sunday after the fa tigues of the day, will not keep beyond to-mor row. These are something like grievances, and make me think the weather most unseasonably close."

"The sweets of housekeeping in a country vill lage!" said Miss Crawford, archly. "Commence me to the nurseryman and the poulterer."

"My dear child, commend Dr Grant to the deanery of Westminster or St Paul's, and I should be as glad of your nurseryman and poul terer as you could be. But we have no such people in Mansfield. What would you have me do?"

"Oh! you can do nothing but what you do al [392] ready: be plagued very often, and never lose your temper."

"Thank you; but there is no escaping these little vexations, Mary, live where we may; and when you are settled in town and I come to see you, I dare say I shall find you with yours, in spite of the nurseryman and the poulterer—or perhaps on their very account. Their remoteness and unpunctuality, or their exorbitant charges and frauds, will be drawing forth bitter lamentations."

"I mean to be too rich to lament or to feel anything of the sort. A large income is the best recipé for happiness I ever heard of. It certainly may secure all the myrtle and turkey part of it."

"You intend to be very rich?" said Edmund, with a look which, to Fanny's eye, had a great deal of serious meaning.

"To be sure. Do not you? Do not we all?" "I cannot intend anything which it must be so completely beyond my power to command. Miss Crawford may chuse her degree of wealth. She has only to fix on her number of thousands a year, and there can be no doubt of their coming. My intentions are only not to be poor."

"By moderation and economy, and bringing down your wants to your income, and all that. I understand you—and a very proper plan it is for a person at your time of life, with such limited means and indifferent connections. What can you want but a decent maintenance? You have not much time before you; and your relations are in no situation to do anything for you, or to mortify you by the contrast of their own wealth and consequence. Be honest and poor, by all means—but I shall not envy you; I do not much think I shall even respect you. I have a much greater respect for those that are honest and rich."

[303]

"Your degree of respect for honesty, rich or poor, is precisely what I have no manner of concern with. I do not mean to be poor. Poverty is exactly what I have determined against. Honesty, in the something between, in the middle state of wordly circumstances, is all that I am anxious for your not looking down on."

"But I do look down upon it, if it might have been higher. I must look down upon anything contented with obscurity when it might rise to distinction?"

"But how may it rise? How may my honesty at least rise to any distinction?"

This was not so very easy a question to answer and ocasioned an "Oh!" of some length from the fair lady before she could add, "You ought to be in parliament, or you should have gone into the army ten years ago."

"That is not much to the purpose now; and [304]

as to my being in parliament, I believe I must wait till there is an especial assembly for the representation of younger sons who have little to live on. No, Miss Crawford," he added, in a more serious tone, "there are distinctions which I should be miserable if I thought myself without any chance—absolutely without chance or possibility of obtaining—but they are of a different character."

A look of consciousness, as he spoke, and what seemed a consciousness of manner on Miss Crawford's side as she made some laughing answer, was sorrowful food for Fanny's observation; and finding herself quite unable to attend as she ought to Mrs Grant, by whose side she was now following the others, she had nearly resolved on going home immediately, and only waited for courage to say so, when the sound of the great clock at Mansfield Park, striking three, made her feel that she had really been much longer absent than usual, and brought the previous selfinquiry of whether she should take leave or not just then, and how, to a very speedy issue. With undoubting decision she directly began her adieus; and Edmund began at the same time to recollect, that his mother had been inquiring for her, and that he had walked down to the Parsonage on purpose to bring her back.

Fanny's hurry increased; and without in the [305]

least expecting Edmund's attendance, she would have hastened away alone; but the general pace was quickened, and they all accompanied her into the house through which it was necessary to pass. Dr Grant was in the vestibule, and as they stopt to speak to him she found, from Edmund's manner, that he did mean to go with her. He, too, was taking leave. She could not but be thankful. In the moment of parting, Edmund was invited by Dr Grant to eat his mutton with him the next day; and Fanny had barely time for an unpleasant feeling on the occasion, when Mrs Grant, with sudden recollection, turned to her, and asked for the pleasure of her company too. This was so new an attention, so perfectly new a circumstance in the events of Fanny's life, that she was all surprise and embarrassment; and while stammering out her obligation, and her-"but she did not suppose it would be in her power," was looking at Edmund for his opinion and help. But Edmund, delighted with her having such an happiness offered, and ascertaining with half a look, and half a sentence, that she had no objection but on her aunt's account, could not imagine that his mother would make any difficulty of sparing her, and therefore gave his decided open advice that the invitation should be accepted; and though Fanny would not venture, even on his encouragement, to such a flight of [306] audacious independence, it was soon settled, that if nothing were heard to the contrary, Mrs Grant might expect her.

"And you know what your dinner will be," said Mrs Grant, smiling—"the turkey, and I assure you a very fine one; for, my dear," turning to her husband, "cook insists upon the turkey's being dressed to-morrow."

"Very well, very well," cried Dr Grant, "all the better; I am glad to hear you have any thing so good in the house. But Miss Price and Mr Edmund Bertram, I dare say, would take their chance. We none of us want to hear the bill of fare. A friendly meeting, and not a fine dinner, is all we have in view. A turkey, or a goose, or a leg of mutton, or whatever you and your cook chuse to give us."

The two cousins walked home together; and, except in the immediate discussion of this engagement, which Edmund spoke of with the warmest satisfaction, as so particularly desirable for her in the intimacy which he saw with so much pleasure established, it was a silent walk; for having finished that subject, he grew thoughtful and indisposed for any other.

CHAPTER XXIII.

BUT why should Mrs Grant ask Fanny?" said Lady Bertram. "How came she to think of asking Fanny? Fanny never dines there, you know, in this sort of way. I cannot spare her, and I am sure she does not want to go. Fanny, you do not want to go, do you?"

"If you put such a question to her," cried Edmund, preventing his cousin's speaking, "Fanny will immediately say, No; but I am sure, my dear mother, she would like to go; and I can see no reason why she should not."

"I cannot imagine why Mrs Grant should think of asking her? She never did before. She used to ask your sisters now and then, but she never asked Fanny."

"If you cannot do without me, ma'am-"" said Fanny, in a self-denying tone.

"But my mother will have my father with her all the evening."

"To be sure, so I shall."

"Suppose you take my father's opinion, ma'am."

"That's well thought of. So I will, Edmund. I will ask Sir Thomas, as soon as he comes in, whether I can do without her."

[308]

"As you please, ma'am, on that head; but I meant my father's opinion as to the propriety of the invitation's being accepted or not; and I think he will consider it a right thing by Mrs Grant, as well as by Fanny, that being the first invitation it should be accepted."

"I do not know. We will ask him. But he will be very much surprized that Mrs Grant should ask Fanny at all."

There was nothing more to be said, or that could be said, to any purpose, till Sir Thomas were present; but the subject involving, as it did, her own evening's comfort for the morrow, was so much uppermost in Lady Bertram's mind, that half an hour afterwards, on his looking in for a minute in his way from his plantation to his dressing-room, she called him back again, when he had almost closed the door, with "Sir Thomas, stop a moment—I have something to say to you."

Her tone of calm languor, for she never took the trouble of raising her voice, was always heard and attended to; and Sir Thomas came back. Her story began; and Fanny immediately slipped out of the room; for to hear herself the subject of any discussion with her uncle was more than her nerves could bear. She was anxious, she knew—more anxious perhaps than she ought to be—for what was it after all whether she went or staid? but if her uncle were to be a great while considering and deciding, and with very grave looks directed to her, and at last decide against her, she might not be able to appear properly submissive and indifferent. Her cause, meanwhile, went on well. It began, on Lady Bertram's part, with—"I have something to tell you that will surprize you. Mrs Grant has asked Fanny to dinner."

[309]

"Well," said Sir Thomas, as if waiting more to accomplish the surprize.

"Edmund wants her to go. But how can I spare her?"

"She will be late," said Sir Thomas, taking out his watch; "but what is your difficulty?"

Edmund found himself obliged to speak and fill up the blanks in his mother's story. He told the whole; and she had only to add, "So strange! for Mrs Grant never used to ask her."

"But is it not very natural," observed Edmund, "that Mrs Grant should wish to procure so agreeable a visitor for her sister?"

"Nothing can be more natural," said Sir Thomas, after a short deliberation; "nor, were there no sister in the case, could anything, in my opinion, be more natural. Mrs Grant's shewing civility to Miss Price, to Lady Bertram's neice, could never want explanation. The only surprize I can feel is, that this should be the first [310] time of its being paid. Fanny was perfectly right in giving only a conditional answer. She appears to feel as she ought. But as I conclude that she must wish to go, since all young people like to be together, I can see no reason why she should be denied the indulgence."

"But can I do without her, Sir Thomas?"

"Indeed I think you may."

"She always makes tea, you know, when my sister is not here."

"Your sister, perhaps, may be prevailed on to spend the day with us, and I shall certainly be at home."

"Very well, then, Fanny may go, Edmund."

The good news soon followed her. Edmund knocked at her door in his way to his own.

"Well, Fanny, it is all happily settled, and without the smallest hesitation on your uncle's side. He had but one opinion. You are to go."

"Thank you, I am so glad," was Fanny's instinctive reply; though when she had turned from him and shut the door, she could not help feeling, "And yet why should I be glad? for am I not certain of seeing or hearing something there to pain me?"

In spite of this conviction, however, she was glad. Simple as such an engagement might appear in other eyes, it had novelty and importance in her's, for excepting the day at Sotherton, she had scarcely ever dined out before; and though now going only half a mile, and only to three people, still it was dining out, and all the little interests of preparation were enjoyments in themselves. She had neither sympathy nor assistance from those who ought to have entered into her feelings and directed her taste; for Lady Bertram never thought of being useful to anybody, and Mrs Norris, when she came on the morrow, in consequence of an early call and invitation from Sir Thomas, was in a very ill humour, and seemed intent only on lessening her uiece's pleasure, both present and future, as much as possible.

[311]

"Upon my word, Fanny, you are in high luck to meet with such attention and indulgence! You ought to be very much obliged to Mrs Grant for thinking of you, and to your aunt for letting you go, and you ought to look upon it as something extraordinary; for I hope you are aware that there is no real occasion for your going into company in this sort of way, or ever dining out at all; and it is what you must not depend upon ever being repeated. Nor must you be fancying that the invitation is meant as any particular compliment to you; the compliment is intended to your uncle and aunt and me. Mrs Grant thinks it a civility due to us to take a little notice of you, or else it would never have come into her head, and you may be very certain, that if your cousin Julia had been at home, you would not have been asked at all."

[312]

Mrs Norris had now so ingeniously done away all Mrs Grant's part of the favour, that Fanny, who found herself expected to speak, could only say that she was very much obliged to her aunt Bertram for sparing her, and that she was endeavouring to put her aunt's evening work in such a state as to prevent her being missed.

"Oh! depend upon it, your aunt can do very well without you, or you would not be allowed to go. I shall be here, so you may be quite easy about your aunt. And I hope you will have a very agreeable day, and find it all mighty delightful. But I must observe that five is the very awkwardest of all possible numbers to sit down to table; and I cannot but be surprized that such an elegant lady as Mrs Grant should not contrive better! And round their enormous great wide table, too, which fills up the room so dreadfully! Had the Doctor been contented to take my dining table when I came away, as anybody in their senses would have done, instead of having that absurd new one of his own, which is wider, literally wider than the dinner table here, how infinitely better it would have been! and how much more he would have been respected! for people are never respected when they step out [313] of their proper sphere. Remember that, Fanny. Five-only five to be sitting round that table. However, you will have dinner enough on it for ten, I dare say."

Mrs Norris fetched breath, and went on again.

"The nonsense and folly of people's stepping out of their rank and trying to appear above themselves, makes me think it right to give you a hint, Fanny, now that you are going into company without any of us; and I do beseech and entreat you not to be putting yourself forward, and talking and giving your opinion as if you were one of your cousins, as if you were dear Mrs Rushworth or Julia. That will never do, believe me. Remember, wherever you are, you must be lowest and last; and though Miss Crawford is in a manner at home at the Parsonage, you are not to be taking place of her. And as to coming away at night, you are to stay just as long as Edmund chuses. Leave him to settle that."

"Yes, ma'am, I should not think of anything else."

"And if it should rain, which I think exceedingly likely, for I never saw it more threatening for a wet evening in my life, you must manage as well as you can, and not be expecting the carriage to be sent for you. I certainly do not go home to-night, and, therefore, the carriage will not be out on my account; so you must make up your mind to what may happen, and take your things accordingly."

[314]

Her niece thought it perfectly reasonable. She rated her own claims to comfort as low even as Mrs Norris could; and when Sir Thomas, soon afterwards, just opening the door, said, "Fanny, at what time would you have the carriage come round?" she felt a degree of astonishment which made it impossible for her to speak.

"My dear Sir Thomas!" cried Mrs Norris, red with anger, "Fanny can walk."

"Walk!" repeated Sir Thomas, in a tone of most unanswerable dignity, and coming farther into the room. "My niece walk to a dinner engagement at this time of the year! Will twenty minutes after four suit you?"

"Yes, sir," was Fanny's humble answer, given with the feelings almost of a criminal towards Mrs Norris; and not bearing to remain with her in what might seem a state of triumph, she followed her uncle out of the room, having staid behind only long enough to hear these words spoken in angry agitation:—

"Quite unnecessary! a great deal too kind! But Edmund goes; true, it is upon Edmund's account. I observed he was hoarse on Thursday night."

But this could not impose on Fanny. She felt [315] that the carriage was for herself, and herself, alone; and her uncle's consideration of her, coming immediately after such representations from her aunt, cost her some tears of gratitude when she was alone.

The coachman drove round to a minute; another minute brought down the gentleman; and as the lady had, with a most scrupulous fear of being late, been many minutes seated in the drawing-room, Sir Thomas saw them off in as good time as his own correctly punctual habits required.

"Now I must look at you, Fanny," said Edmund, with the kind smile of an affectionate brother, "and tell you how I like you; and as well as I can judge by this light, you look very nicely indeed. What have you got on?"

"The new dress that my uncle was so good as to give me on my cousin's marriage. I hope it is not too fine; but I thought I ought to wear it as soon as I could, and that I might not have such another opportunity all the winter. I hope you do not think me too fine."

"A woman can never be too fine while she is all in white. No, I see no finery about you; nothing but what is perfectly proper. Your gown seems very pretty. I like these glossy spots. Has not Miss Crawford a gown something the same?"

[316]

In approaching the Parsonage they passed close by the stable-yard and coach-house.

"Hey-day!" said Edmund, "here's company, here's a carriage! who have they got to meet us?" And letting down the side-glass to distinguish, "Tis Crawford's, Crawford's barouche, I protest! There are his own two men pushing it back into its old quarters. He is here, of course. This is quite a surprize, Fanny. I shall be very glad to see him."

There was no occasion, there was no time for Fanny to say how very differently she felt; but the idea of having such another to observe her, was a great increase of the trepidation with which she performed the very aweful ceremony of walking into the drawing-room.

In the drawing-room Mr Crawford certainly was; having been just long enough arrived to be ready for dinner; and the smiles and pleased looks of the three others standing round him, showed how welcome was his sudden resolution of coming to them for a few days on leaving Bath. A very cordial meeting passed between him and Edmund; and with the exception of Fanny, the pleasure was general; and even to her, there might be some advantage in his presence, since every addition to the party must rather forward her favourite indulgence of being suffered to sit silent and unattended to. She was soon aware of this herself; for though she must submit, as her own propriety of mind directed, in spite of her aunt Norris's opinion, to being the principal lady in company, and to all the little distinctions consequent thereon, she found, while they were at table, such a happy flow of conversation prevailing, in which she was not required to take any part-there was so much to be said between the brother and sister about Bath, so much between the two young men about hunting, so much of politics between Mr Crawford and Dr Grant, and of everything and all together between Mr Crawford and Mrs Grant, as to leave her the fairest prospect of having only to listen in quiet, and of passing a very agreeable day. She could not compliment the newly-arrived gentleman, however, with any appearance of interest, in a scheme for extending his stay at Mansfield and sending for his hunters from Norfolk, which, suggested by Dr Grant, advised by Edmund, and warmly urged by the two sisters, was soon in possession of his mind, and which he seemed to want to be encouraged even by her to resolve on. Her opinion was sought as to the probable continuance of the open weather, but her answers were as short and indifferent as civility allowed. She could not wish him to stay, and would much rather not have him speak to her.

[317]

Her two absent cousins, especially Maria, were [318] much in her thoughts on seeing him; but no embarrassing remembrance affected his spirits. Here he was again on the same ground where all had passed before, and apparently as willing to stay and be happy without the Miss Bertrams, as if he had never known Mansfield in any other state. She heard them spoken of by him only in a general way, till they were all re-assembled in the drawing-room, when Edmund, being engaged apart in some matter of business with Dr Grant, which seemed entirely to engross them, and Mrs Grant occupied at the tea-table, he began talking of them with more particularity to his other sister. With a significant smile, which made Fanny quite hate him, he said, "So Rushworth and his fair bride are at Brighton, I understand; happy man!"

"Yes, they have been there about a fortnight, Miss Price, have they not? And Julia is with them."

"And Mr Yates, I presume, is not far off." "Mr Yates! Oh! we hear nothing of Mr Yates. I do not imagine he figures much in the letters to Mansfield Park; do you, Miss Price? I think my friend Julia knows better than to entertain her father with Mr Yates."

"Poor Rushworth and his two-and-forty speeches!" continued Crawford. "Nobody can ever forget them. Poor fellow! I see him now

[319]

-his toil and his despair. Well, I am much mistaken if his lovely Maria will ever want him to make two-and-forty speeches to her;" adding, with a momentary seriousness, "She is too good for him-much too good." And then changing his tone again to one of gentle gallantry, and addressing Fanny, he said, "You were Mr Rushworth's best friend. Your kindness and patience can never be forgotten, your indefatigable patience in trying to make it possible for him to learn his part—in trying to give him a brain which nature had denied-to mix up understanding for him out of the superfluity of your own! He might not have sense enough himself to estimate your kindness, but I may venture to say that it had honour from all the rest of the party."

Fanny coloured, and said nothing.

"It is a dream, a pleasant dream!" he exclaimed, breaking forth again, after a few minutes' musing. "I shall always look back on our theatricals with exquisite pleasure. There was such an interest, such an animation, such a spirit diffused. Everybody felt it. We were all alive. There was employment, hope, solicitude, bustle, for every hour of the day. Always some little objection, some little doubt, some little anxiety to be got over. I never was happier."

With silent indignation, Fanny repeated to herself, "Never happier!—never happier than [320] when doing what you must know was not justifiable!—never happier than when behaving so dishonourably and unfeelingly! Oh! what a corrupted mind!"

"We were unlucky, Miss Price," he continued, in a lower tone, to avoid the possibility of being heard by Edmund, and not at all aware of her feelings, "we certainly were very unlucky. Another week, only one other week, would have been enough for us. I think if we had had the disposal of events—if Mansfield Park had had the government of the winds just for a week or two, about the equinox, there would have been a difference. Not that we would have endangered his safety by any tremendous weather but only by a steady contrary wind, or a calm. I think, Miss Price, we would have indulged ourselves with a week's calm in the Atlantic at that season."

He seemed determined to be answered; and Fanny averting her face, said with a firmer tone than usual, "As far as I am concerned, sir, I would not have delayed his return for a day. My uncle disapproved it all so entirely when he did arrive, that in my opinion everything had gone quite far enough."

She had never spoken so much at once to him in her life before, and never so angrily to any one; and when her speech was over, she trembled and blushed at her own daring. He was surprized; but after a few moments' silent consideration of her, replied in a calmer, graver tone, and as if the candid result of conviction, "I believe you are right. It was more pleasant than prudent. We were getting too noisy." And then turning the conversation, he would have engaged her on some other subject, but her answers were so shy and reluctant that he could not advance in any.

[321]

Miss Crawford, who had been repeatedly eyeing Dr Grant and Edmund, now observed, "Those gentlemen must have some very interesting point to discuss."

"The most interesting in the world," replied her brother—"how to make money; how to turn a good income into a better. Dr Grant is giving Bertram instructions about the living he is to step into so soon. I find he takes orders in a few weeks. They were at it in the dining-parlour. I am glad to hear Bertram will be so well off. He will have a very pretty income to make ducks and drakes with, and earned without much trouble. I apprehend he will not have less than seven hundred a year. Seven hundred a year is a fine thing for a younger brother; and as of course he will still live at home, it will be all for his menus plaisirs; and a sermon at Christmas and Easter, I suppose, will be the sum total of sacrifice."

[322]

His sister tried to laugh off her feelings by saying, "Nothing amuses me more than the easy manner with which everybody settles the abundance of those who have a great deal less than themselves. You would look rather blank, Henry, if your menus plaisirs were to be limited to seven hundred a year."

"Perhaps I might; but all that you know is entirely comparative. Birthright and habit must settle the business. Bertram is certainly well off for a cadet of even a baronet's family. By the time he is four or five and twenty he will have seven hundred a year, and nothing to do for it."

Miss Crawford could have said that there would be a something to do and to suffer for it, which she could not think lightly of; but she checked herself and let it pass; and tried to look calm and unconcerned when the two gentlemen shortly afterwards joined them.

"Bertram," said Henry Crawford, "I shall make a point of coming to Mansfield to hear you preach your first sermon. I shall come on purpose to encourage a young beginner. When is it to be? Miss Price, will not you engage to attend with your eyes steadily fixed on him the whole time—as I shall do—not to lose a word; or only looking off just to note down any sentence pre-eminently beautiful? We will provide ourselves with tablets and a pencil. When will it be? You must preach at Mansfield, you know, that Sir Thomas and Lady Bertram may hear you."

[323]

"I shall keep clear of you, Crawford, as long as I can," said Edmund; "for you would be more likely to disconcert me, and I should be more sorry to see you trying at it than almost any other man."

"Will he not feel this?" thought Fanny, "No, he can feel nothing as he ought."

The party being now all united, and the chief talkers attracting each other, she remained in tranquillity; and as a whist table was formed after tea—formed really for the amusement of Dr Grant, by his attentive wife, though it was not to be supposed so—and Miss Crawford took her harp, she had nothing to do but to listen; and her tranquillity remained undisturbed the rest of the evening, except when Mr Crawford now and then addressed her a question or observation, which she could not avoid answering. Miss Crawford was too much vexed by what had passed to be in a humour for anything but music. With that she soothed herself and amused her friend.

The assurance of Edmund's being so soon to take orders, coming upon her like a blow that had been suspended, and still hoped uncertain and at a distance, was felt with resentment and [324] mortification. She was very angry with him. She had thought her influence more. She had begun to think of him; she felt that she had, with great regard, with almost decided intentions; but she would now meet him with his own feelings It was plain that he could have no serious views, no true attachment, by fixing himself in a situation which he must know she would never stoop to. She would learn to match him in his indifference. She would henceforth admit his attentions without any idea beyond immediate amusement. If he could so command his affections, her's should do her no harm.

CHAPTER XXIV.

H ENRY CRAWFORD had quite made up his mind by the next morning to give another fortnight to Mansfield, and having sent for his hunters, and written a few lines of explanation to the Admiral, he looked round at his sister as he sealed and threw the letter from him, and seeing the coast clear of the rest of the family, said, with a smile, "And how do you think I mean to amuse myself, Mary, on the days that I do not hunt? I am grown too old to go out more than three times a-week; but I have a plan for the intermediate days, and what do you think it is?"

[325]

"To walk and ride with me, to be sure."

"Not exactly, though I shall be happy to do both, but that would be exercise only to my body, and I must take care of my mind. Besides, that would be all recreation and indulgence, without the wholesome alloy of labour, and I do not like to eat the bread of idleness. No, my plan is to make Fanny Price in love with me."

"Fanny Price! Nonsense! No, no. You ought to be satisfied with her two cousins."

"But I cannot be satisfied without Fanny Price, without making a small hole in Fanny Price's heart. You do not seem properly aware of her claims to notice. When we talked of her last night, you none of you seemed sensible of the wonderful improvement that has taken place in her looks within the last six weeks. //You see her every day, and therefore do not notice it; but I assure you she is quite a different creature from what she was in the autumn. She was then merely a quiet, modest, not plain-looking girl, but she is now absolutely pretty. I used to think she had neither complexion nor countenance; but in that soft skin of her's, so frequently tinged with a blush as it was yesterday, there is decided beauty; and from what I observed of her eyes and mouth, I do not despair of their being cap-[326] able of expression enough when she has anything to express. And then, her air, her manner, her tout ensemble, is so indescribably improved! She must be grown two inches, at least, since October."

"Phoo! phoo! This is only because there were no tall women to compare her with, and because she has got a new gown, and you never saw her so well dressed before. She is just what she was in October, believe me. The truth is, that she was the only girl in company for you to notice, and you must have a somebody. I have always thought her pretty-not strikingly pretty-but 'pretty enough,' as people say; a sort of beauty that grows on one. Her eyes should be darker, but she has a sweet smile; but as for this wonderful degree of improvement, I am sure it may all be resolved into a better style of dress, and your having nobody else to look at; and therefore, if you do set about a flirtation with her, you never will persuade me that it is in compliment to her beauty, or that it proceeds from anything but your own idleness and folly."

Her brother gave only a smile to this acusation, and soon afterwards said, "I do not quite know what to make of Miss Fanny. I do not understand her. I could not tell what she would be at yesterday. What is her character? Is she solemn? Is she queer? Is she prudish?

E ..

[327]

Why did she draw back and look so grave at me? I could hardly get her to speak. I never was so long in company with a girl in my life, trying to entertain her, and succeed so ill! Never met with a girl who looked so grave on me! I must try to get the better of this. Her looks say, 'I will not like you, I am determined not to like you;' and I say she shall."

"Foolish fellow! And so this is her attraction after all! This it is, her not caring about you, which gives her such a soft skin, and makes her so much taller, and produces all these charms and graces! I do desire that you will not be making her really unhappy; a little love, perhaps, may animate and do her good, but I will not have you plunge her deep, for she is as good a little creature as ever lived, and has a great deal of feeling."

"It can be but for a fortnight," said Henry; "and if a fortnight can kill her, she must have a constitution which nothing could save. No, I will not do her any harm, dear little soul! I only want her to look kindly on me, to give me smiles as well as blushes, to keep a chair for me by herself wherever we are, and be all animation when I take it and talk to her; to think as I think, be interested in all my possessions and pleasures, try to keep me longer at Mansfield, and feel when I go away that she shall be never happy again. I want nothing more."

[328]

"Moderation itself!" said Mary. "I can have no scruples now. Well, you will have opportunities enough of endeavouring to recommend yourself, for we are a great deal together."

And without attempting any further remonstrance, she left Fanny to her fate, a fate which, had not Fanny's heart been guarded in a way unsuspected by Miss Crawford, might have been a little harder than she deserved; for although there doubtless are such unconquerable young ladies of eighteen (or one should not read about them) as are never to be persuaded into love against their judgment by all that talent, manner, attention, and flattery can do, I have no inclination to believe Fanny one of them, or to think that with so much tenderness of disposition, and so much taste as belonged to her, she could have escaped heart-whole from the courtship (though the courtship only of a fortnight) of such a man as Crawford, in spite of there being some previous ill opinion of him to be overcome, had not her affection been engaged elsewhere. With all the security which love of another and dis-esteem of him could give to the peace of mind he was attacking, his continued attentions-continued, but not abusive, and adapting themselves more and more to the gentleness and delicacy of her character-obliged her very soon to dislike him less than formerly. She had by no [329] means forgotten the past, and she thought as ill of him as ever: but she felt his powers: he was entertaining; and his manners were so improved. so polite, so seriously and blamelessly polite, that it was impossible not to be civil to him in return. A very few days were enough to effect this; and at the end of those few days, circumstances arose which had a tendency rather to forward his views of pleasing her, inasmuch as they gave her a degree of happiness which must dispose her to be pleased with everybody. William, her brother, the so long absent and dearly loved brother, was in England again. She had a letter from him herself, a few hurried lines, written as the ship came up Channel, and sent into Portsmouth with the first boat that left the Antwerp at anchor in Spithead; and when Crawford walked up with the newspaper in his hand, which he had hoped would bring the first tidings, he found her trembling with joy over this letter, and listening with a glowing, grateful countenance to the kind invitation which her uncle was most collectedly dictating in reply.

.

It was but the day before, that Crawford had made himself thoroughly master of the subject, or had in fact become at all aware of her having such a brother, or his being in such a ship, but the interest then excited had been very properly lively, determining him on his return to town to [330] apply for information as to the probable period of the Antwerp's return from the Mediterranean, &c.; and the good luck which attended his early examination of ship news the next morning, seemed the reward of his ingenuity in finding out such a method of pleasing her, as well as of his dutiful attention to the Admiral, in having for many years taken in the paper esteemed to have the earliest naval intelligence. He proved, however, to be too late. All those fine first feelings, of which he had hoped to be the exciter, were already given. But his intention, the kindness of his intention, was thankfully acknowledged: quite thankfully and warmly, for she was elevated beyond the common timidity of her mind by the flow of her love for William.

This dear William would soon be amongst them. There could be no doubt of his obtaining leave of absence immediately, for he was still only a midshipman; and as his parents, from living on the spot, must already have seen him, and be seeing him perhaps daily, his direct holidays might with justice be instantly given to his sister, who had been his best correspondent through a period of seven years, and the uncle who had done most for his support and advancement; and accordingly the reply to her reply, fixing a very early day for his arrival, came as soon as possible; and scarcely ten days had passed since

[331]

Fanny had been in the agitation of her first dinner visit, when she found herself in an agitation of a higher nature, watching in the hall, in the lobby, on the stairs, for the first sound of the carriage which was to bring her brother.

It came happily while she was thus waiting; and there being neither ceremony nor fearfulness to delay the moment of meeting, she was with him as he entered the house, and the first minutes of exquisite feeling had no interruption and no witnesses, unless the servants chiefly intent upon opening the proper doors could be called such. This was exactly what Sir Thomas and Edmund had been separately conniving at, as each proved to the other by the sympathetic alacrity with which they both advised Mrs Norris's continuing where she was, instead of rushing out into the hall as soon as the noises of the arrival reached them.

William and Fanny soon shewed themselves; and Sir Thomas had the pleasure of receiving, in his protégé, certainly a very different person from the one he had equipped seven years ago, but a young man of an open, pleasant countenance, and frank, unstudied, but feeling and respectful manners, and such as confirmed him his friend.

It was long before Fanny could recover from the agitating happiness of such an hour as was formed by the last thirty minutes of expectation, and the first of fruition; it was some time even before her happiness could be said to make her happy, before the disappointment inseparable from the alteration of person had vanished, and she could see in him the same William as before, and talk to him, as her heart had been yearning to do, through many a past year. That time, however, did gradually come, forwarded by an affection on his side as warm as her own, and much less incumbered by refinement or self-distrust. She was the first object of his love, but it was a love which his stronger spirits, and bolder temper, made it as natural for him to express as to feel. On the morrow, they were walking about together with true enjoyment, and every succeeding morrow renewed a tête-à-tête, which Sir Thomas could not but observe with complacency, even before Edmund had pointed it out to him.

[332]

Excepting the moments of peculiar delight, which any marked or unlooked-for instance of Edmund's consideration of her in the last few months had excited, Fanny had never known so much felicity in her life, as in this unchecked, equal, fearless intercourse with the brother and friend, who was opening all his heart to her, telling her all his hopes and fears, plans, and solicitudes respecting that long thought of, dearly earned, and justly valued blessing of promotion; who could give her direct and minute information of the father and mother, brothers and sisters, of whom she very seldom heard; who was interested in all the comforts and all the little hardships of her home, at Mansfield; ready to think of every member of that home as she directed, or differing only by a less scrupulous opinion, and more noisy abuse of their aunt Norris, and with whom (perhaps the dearest indulgence of the whole) all the evil and good of their earliest years, could be gone over again, and every former united pain and pleasure retraced with the fondest recollection. An advantage this, a strengthener of love, in which even the conjugal tie is beneath the fraternal. Children of the same family, the same blood, with the same first associations and habits, have some means of enjoyment in their power, which no subsequent connections can supply; and it must be by a long and unnatural estrangement, by a divorce which no subsequent connection can justify, if such precious remains of the earliest attachments are ever entirely outlived. Too often, alas! it is so. Fraternal love, sometimes almost everything, is at others worse than nothing. But with William and Fanny Price it was still a sentiment in all its prime and freshness, wounded by no opposition of interest, cooled by no separate attachment, and feeling the influence of time and absence only in its increase.

[333]

[334]

An affection so amiable was advancing each in the opinion of all who had hearts to value anything good. Henry Crawford was as much struck with it as any. He honoured the warmhearted, blunt fondness of the young sailor, which led him to say, with his hands stretched towards Fanny's head, "Do you know, I begin to like that queer fashion already, though when I first heard of such things being done in England, I could not believe it; and when Mrs Brown, and the other women, at the Commissioner's at Gibraltar, appeared in the same trim, I thought they were mad; but Fanny can reconcile me to anything;" and saw, with lively admiration, the glow of Fanny's cheek, the brightness of her eye, the deep interest, the absorbed attention, while her brother was describing any of the imminent hazards, or terrific scenes, which such a period, at sea, must supply.

It was a picture which Henry Crawford had moral taste enough to value. Fanny's attractions increased—increased two-fold; for the sensibility which beautified her complexion and illumined her countenance was an attraction in itself. He was no longer in doubt of the capabilities of her heart. She had feeling, genuine feeling. It would be something to be loved by such a girl, to excite the first ardours of her young, unsophisticated mind! She interested him more than he had foreseen. A fortnight was not enough. His stay became indefinite.

[335]

William was often called on by his uncle to be the talker. His recitals were amusing in themselves to Sir Thomas, but the chief object in seeking them was to understand the recitor, to know the young man by his histories; and he listened to his clear, simple, spirited details with full satisfaction, seeing in them the proof of good principles, professional knowledge, energy, courage, and cheerfulness, everything that could deserve or promise well. Young as he was, William had already seen a great deal. He had been in the Mediterranean; in the West Indies; in the Mediterranean again; had been often taken on shore by the favour of his captain, and in the course of seven years had known every variety of danger which sea and war together could offer. With such means in his power he had a right to be listened to; and though Mrs Norris could fidget about the room, and disturb everybody in quest of two needlefuls of thread or a secondhand shirt button, in the midst of her nephew's account of a shipwreck or an engagement, everybody else was attentive; and even Lady Bertram could not hear of such horrors unmoved, or without sometimes lifting her eyes from her work to say, "Dear me! how disagreeable! I wonder anybody can ever go to sea."

[336]

To Henry Crawford they gave a different feeling. He longed to have been at sea, and seen and done and suffered as much. His heart was warmed, his fancy fired, and he felt the highest respect for a lad who, before he was twenty, had gone through such bodily hardships, and given such proofs of mind. The glory of heroism, of usefulness, of exertion, of endurance, made his own habits of selfish indulgence appear in shameful contrast; and he wished he had been a William Price, distinguishing himself and working his way to fortune and consequence with so much self-respect and happy ardour, instead of what he was!

The wish was rather eager than lasting. He was roused from the reverie of retrospection and regret produced by it, by some inquiry from Edmund as to his plans for the next day's hunting; and he found it was as well to be a man of fortune at once with horses and grooms at his command. In one respect it was better, as it gave him the means of conferring a kindness where he wished to oblige. With spirits, courage, and curiosity up to anything, William expressed an inclination to hunt; and Crawford could mount him without the slightest inconvenience to himself, and with only some scruples to obviate in Sir Thomas, who knew better than his nephew the value of such a loan, and some alarms to reason away in Fanny. She feared for William; by no means convinced by all that he could relate of his own horsemanship in various countries, of the scrambling parties in which he had been engaged, the rough horses and mules, he had ridden, or his many narrow escapes from dreadful falls, that he was at all equal to the management of a high-fed hunter in an English fox-chase: nor till he returned safe and well, without accident or discredit, could she be reconciled to the risk, or feel any of that obligation to Mr Crawford for lending the horse, which he had fully intended it should produce. When it was proved, however, to have done William no harm, she could allow it to be a kindness, and even reward the owner with a smile when the animal was one minute tendered to his use again; and the next, with the greatest cordiality, and in a manner not to be resisted, made over to his use entirely so long as he remained in Northamptonshire.

[337]

Mansfield Park PART II

CHAPTER XXV.

THE intercourse of the two families was at this period more nearly restored to what it had been in the autumn, than any member of the old intimacy had thought ever likely to be again. The return of Henry Crawford, and the arrival of William Price, had much to do with it, but much was still owing to Sir Thomas's more than toleration of the neighbourly attempts at the Parsonage. His mind. now disengaged from the cares which had pressed on him at first, was at leisure to find the Grants and their young inmates really worth visiting; and though infinitely above scheming or contriving for any the most advantageous matrimonial establishment that could be among the apparent possibilities of any one most dear to him, and disdaining even as a littleness the being quicksighted on such points, he could not avoid perceiving, in a grand and careless way, that Mr Crawford was somewhat distinguishing his niece ---nor perhaps refrain (though unconsciously) from giving a more willing assent to invitations on that account.

His readiness, however, in agreeing to dine at the Parsonage, when the general invitation was at last hazarded, after many debates and many doubts as to whether it were worth while, "because Sir Thomas seemed so ill inclined, and Lady Bertram was so indolent!" proceeded from good breeding and good-will alone, and had nothing to do with Mr Crawford, but as being one in an agreeable group; for it was in the course of that very visit, that he first began to think, that any one in the habit of such idle observations would have thought that Mr Crawford was the admirer of Fanny Price.

The meeting was generally felt to be a pleasant one, being composed in a good proportion of those who would talk and those who would listen; and the dinner itself was elegant and plentiful, according to the usual style of the Grants, and too much according to the usual habits of all to raise any emotion except in Mrs Norris, who could never behold either the wide table or the number of dishes on it with patience, and who did always contrive to experience some evil from the passing of the servants behind her chair, and to bring away some fresh conviction of its being impossible among so many dishes but that some must be cold.

[2]

In the evening it was found, according to the predetermination of Mrs Grant and her sister, that after making up the whist table there would remain sufficient for a round game, and everybody being as perfectly complying and without a choice as on such occasions they always are, speculation was decided on almost as soon as whist; and Lady Bertram soon found herself in the critical situation of being applied to for her own choice between the games, and being required either to draw a card for whist or not. She hesitated. Luckily Sir Thomas was at hand. "What shall I do, Sir Thomas? Whist and speculation; which will amuse me most?"

Sir Thomas, after a moment's thought, recommended speculation. He was a whist player himself, and perhaps might feel that it would not much amuse him to have her for a partner.

"Very well," was her ladyship's contented answer; "then speculation, if you please, Mrs Grant. I know nothing about it, but Fanny must teach me."

Here Fanny interposed, however, with anxious protestations of her own equal ignorance; she had never played the game nor seen it played in her life; and Lady Bertram felt a moment's indecision again; but upon everybody's assuring her that nothing could be so easy, that it was the easiest game on the cards, and Henry Craw-ford's stepping forward with a most earnest request to be allowed to sit between her ladyship and Miss Price and teach them both, it was so settled; and Sir Thomas, Mrs Norris and Dr and Mrs Grant being seated at the table of prime intellectual state and dignity, the remaining six, under Miss Crawford's direction, were arranged round the other. It was a fine arrangement for Henry Crawford, who was close to Fanny, and with his hands full of business, having two persons' cards to manage as well as his own; for though it was impossible for Fanny not to feel herself mistress of the rules of the game in three minutes, he had yet to inspirit her play, sharpen her avarice, and harden her heart, which, especially in any competition with William, was a work of some difficulty; and as for Lady Bertram, he must continue in charge of all her fame and fortune through the whole evening; and if quick enough to keep her from looking at her cards when the deal began, must direct her in whatever was to be done with them to the end of it.

[3]

He was in high spirits, doing everything with happy ease, and pre-eminent in all the lively turns, quick resources, and playful impudence that could do honour to the game; and the round table was altogether a very comfortable contrast to the steady sobriety and orderly silence of the other.

[4]

Twice had Sir Thomas inquired into the enjoyment and success of his lady, but in vain; no pause was long enough for the time his measured manner needed; and very little of her state could be known till Mrs Grant was able, at the end of the first rubber, to go to her and pay her compliments.

"I hope your ladyship is pleased with the game."

"Oh dear, yes! Very entertaining, indeed. A very odd game. I do not know what it is all about. I am never to see my cards; and Mr Crawford does all the rest."

"Bertram," said Crawford, some time afterwards, taking the opportunity of a little languor in the game, "I have never told you what happened to me vesterday in my ride home." They had been hunting together, and were in the midst of a good run, and at some distance from Mansfield, when his horse being found to have flung a shoe, Henry Crawford had been obliged to give up, and make the best of his way back. " T told you I lost my way after passing that old farm-house, with the yew-trees, because I can never bear to ask; but I have not told you that, with my usual luck-for I never do wrong without gaining by it-I found myself in due time in the very place which I had a curiosity to see. I was suddenly, upon turning the corner of a steepish downy field, in the midst of a retired little village between gently rising hills; a small stream before me to be forded, a church standing on a sort of knoll to my right—which church was strikingly large and handsome for the place, and not a gentleman or half a gentleman's house to be seen excepting one—to be presumed the Parsonage—within a stone's throw of the said knoll and church. I found myself, in short, in Thornton Lacey."

"It sounds like it," said Edmund; "but which way did you turn after passing Sewell's farm?"

"I answer no such irrelevant and insidious questions; though were I to answer all that you could put in the course of an hour, you would never be able to prove that it was not Thornton Lacey—for such it certainly was."

"You inquired then?"

"No, I never inquire. But I told a man mending a hedge that it was Thornton Lacey, and he agreed to it."

"You have a good memory. I had forgotten having ever told you half so much of the place."

Thornton Lacey was the name of his impending living, as Miss Crawford well knew; and her interest in a negotiation for William Price's knave increased.

"Well," continued Edmund, "and how did you like what you saw?"

[6]

"Very much, indeed. You are a lucky fellow. There will be work for five summers at least before the place is live-able."

"No, no, not so bad as that. The farm-yard must be moved, I grant you; but I am not aware of anything else. The house is by no means bad, and when the yard is removed, there may be a very tolerable approach to it."

"The farm-yard must be cleared away entirely, and planted up to shut out the blacksmith's shop. The house must be turned to front the east instead of the north; the entrance and principal rooms, I mean, must be on that side, where the view is really very pretty; I am sure it may be done. And there must be your approach, through what is at present the garden. You must make a new garden at what is now the back of the house; which will be giving it the best aspect in the world, sloping to the southeast. The ground seems precisely formed for it. I rode fifty yards up the lane, between the church and the house, in order to look about me; and saw how it might all be. Nothing can be easier. The meadows beyond what will be the garden, as well as what now is, sweeping round from the lane I stood in to the north-east, that is, to the principal road through the village, must be all laid together of course; very pretty meadows they are, finely sprinkled with timber.

They belong to the living, I suppose; if not, you must purchase them. Then the stream something must be done with the stream; but I could not quite determine what. I had two or three ideas."

"And I have two or three ideas also," said Edmund, "and one of them is, that very little of your plan for Thornton Lacey will ever be put in practice. I must be satisfied with rather less ornament and beauty. I think the house and premises may be made comfortable, and given the air of a gentleman's residence without any very heavy expense, and that must suffice me; and, I hope, may suffice all who care about me."

Miss Crawford, a little suspicious and resentful of a certain tone of voice, and a certain halflook attending the last expression of his hope, made a hasty finish of her dealings with William Price; and securing his knave at an exorbitant rate, exclaimed, "There, I will stake my last like a woman of spirit. No cold prudence for me. I am not born to sit still and do nothing. If I lose the game, it shall not be from not striving for it."

The game was her's, and only did not pay her for what she had given to secure it. Another deal proceeded, and Crawford began again about Thornton Lacey.

[8]

"My plan may not be the best possible; I had not many minutes to form it in: but you must do a good deal. The place deserves it, and you will find yourself not satisfied with much less than it is capable of. (Excuse me, your ladyship must not see your cards. There, let them lie just before you.) The place deserves it, Bertram. You talk of giving it the air of a gentleman's residence. That will be done by the removal of the farm-yard; for, independent of that terrible nuisance, I never saw a house of the kind which had in itself so much the air of a gentleman's residence, so much the look of a something above a mere parsonage house; above the expenditure of a few hundreds a-year. It is not a scrambling collection of low single rooms, with as many roofs as windows; it is not cramped into the vulgar compactness of a square farmhouse; it is a solid, roomy, mansion-like looking house, such as one might suppose a respectable old country family had lived in from generation to generation, through two centuries at least, and were now spending from two to three thousand a year in." Miss Crawford listened, and Edmund agreed to this. "The air of a gentleman's residence, therefore, you cannot but give it, if you do anything. But it is capable of much more. (Let me see, Mary; Lady Bertram bids a dozen for that queen; no, no, a dozen is more than it is worth. Lady Bertram does not bid a dozen. She will have nothing to say to it. Go on, go on.) By some such improvements as I have suggested, (I do not really require you to proceed upon my plan, though, by-the-bye, I doubt anybody's striking out a better,)-you may give it a higher character. You may raise it into a place. From being the mere gentleman's residence, it becomes, by judicious improvement, the residence of a man of education, taste, modern manners, good connections. All this may be stamped on it; and that house receive such an air as to make its owner be set down as the great landholder of the parish, by every creature travelling the road; especially as there is no real squire's house to dispute the point; a circumstance, between ourselves, to enhance the value of such a situation in point of privilege and independence beyond all calculation. You think with me, I hope-(turning with a softened voice to Fanny). Have you ever seen the place?"

[9]

Fanny gave a quick negative, and tried to hide her interest in the subject by an eager attention to her brother, who was driving as hard a bargain, and imposing on her as much as he could; but Crawford pursued with "No, no, you must not part with the queen. You have bought her too dearly, and your brother does not offer [10] half her value. No, no, sir, hands off, hands off. Your sister does not part with the queen. She is quite determined. The game will be yours," turning to her again—"it will certainly be yours."

"And Fanny had much rather it were William's," said Edmund, smiling at her. "Poor Fanny! not allowed to cheat herself as she wishes!"

"Mr Bertram," said Miss Crawford, a few minutes afterwards, "you know Henry to be such a capital improver, that you cannot possibly engage in anything of the sort at Thornton Lacey without accepting his help. Only think how useful he was at Sotherton! Only think what grand things were produced there by our all going with him one hot day in August to drive about the grounds, and see his genius take fire. There we went, and there we came home again; and what was done there is not to be told!"

Fanny's eyes were turned on Crawford for a moment with an expression more than grave even reproachful; but on catching his, were instantly withdrawn. With something of consciousness, he shook his head at his sister, and laughingly replied, "I cannot say there was much done at Sotherton; but it was a hot day, and we were all walking after each other, and bewildered." As soon as a general buz gave him shelter, he added, in a low voice, directed solely at Fanny, "I should be sorry to have my powers of planning judged of by the day at Sotherton. I see things very differently now. Do not think of me as I appeared then."

[11]

Sotherton was a word to catch Mrs Norris, and being just then in the happy leisure which followed securing the odd trick by Sir Thomas's capital play and her own, against Dr and Mrs Grant's great hands, she called out, in high goodhumour, "Sotherton! Yes, that is a place, indeed, and we had a charming day there. William, you are quite out of luck: but the next time you come, I hope dear Mr and Mrs Rushworth will be at home, and I am sure I can answer for your being kindly received by both. Your cousins are not of a sort to forget their relations, and Mr Rushworth is a most amiable man. They are at Brighton now, you know; in one of the best houses there, as Mr Rushworth's fine fortune gives them a right to be. I do not exactly know the distance, but when you get back to Portsmouth, if it is not very far off, you ought to go over, and pay your respects to them; and I could send a little parcel by you that I want to get conveyed to your cousins."

"I should be very happy, aunt; but Brighton is almost by Beachey Head; and if I could get so far, I could not expect to be welcome in such a smart place as that—poor scrubby midshipman as I am."

[12]

Mrs Norris was beginning an eager assurance of the affability he might depend on, when she was stopped by Sir Thomas's saying with authority, "I do not advise your going to Brighton, William, as I trust you may soon have more convenient opportunities of meeting; but my daughters would be happy to see their cousins anywhere; and you will find Mr Rushworth most sincerely disposed to regard all the connections of our family as his own."

"I would rather find him private secretary to the First Lord than anything else," was William's only answer, in an under voice, not meant to reach far, and the subject dropped.

As yet Sir Thomas had seen nothing to remark in Mr Crawford's behaviour; but when the whist table broke up at the end of the second rubber, and leaving Dr Grant and Mrs Norris to dispute over their last play he became a lookeron at the other, he found his niece the object of attentions, or rather of professions, of a somewhat pointed character.

Henry Crawford was in the first glow of another scheme about Thornton Lacey; and not being able to catch Edmund's ear, was detailing it to his fair neighbour with a look of considerable earnestness. His scheme was to rent the house himself the following winter, that he might have a home of his own in that neighbourhood; and it was not merely for the use of it in the hunting season (as he was then telling her), though that consideration had certainly some weight, feeling as he did that, in spite of all Dr Grant's very great kindness, it was impossible for him and his horses to be accommodated where they now were without material inconvenience; but his attachment to that neighbourhood did not depend upon one amusement or one season of the year; he had set his heart upon having a something there that he could come to at any time, a little homestal' at his command, where all the holidays of his year might be spent, and he might find himself continuing, improving, and perfecting that friendship and intimacy with the Mansfield Park family which was increasing in value to him every day. Sir Thomas heard and was not offended. There was no want of respect in the young man's address; and Fanny's reception of it was so proper and modest, so calm and uninviting, that he had nothing to censure in her. She said little, assented only here and there, and betrayed no inclination either of appropriating any part of the compliment to herself, or of strengthening his views in favor of Northamptonshire. Finding by whom he was observed, Henry Crawford addressed himself on the same [14] subject to Sir Thomas, in a more every-day tone, but still with feeling.

"I want to be your neighbour, Sir Thomas, as you have, perhaps, heard me telling Miss Price. May I hope for your acquiescence, and for your not influencing your son against such a tenant?"

Sir Thomas politely bowing, replied, "It is the only way, sir, in which I could not wish you established as a permanent neighbour; but I hope, and believe, that Edmund will occupy his own house at Thornton Lacey. Edmund, am I saying too much?"

Edmund, on this appeal, had first to hear what was going on; but, on understanding the question, was at no loss to answer.

"Certainly, sir, I have no idea but of residence. But, Crawford, though I refuse you as a tenant, come to me as a friend. Consider the house as half your own every winter, and we will add to the stables on your own improved plan, and with all the improvements of your improved plan that may occur to you this spring."

"We shall be the losers," continued Sir Thomas. "His going, though only eight miles, will be an unwelcome contraction of our family circle; but I should have been deeply mortified if any son of mine could reconcile himself to doing less. It is perfectly natural that you should not have thought much on the subject, Mr Crawford. But a parish has wants and claims which can be known only by a clergyman constantly resident, and which no proxy can be capable of satisfying to the same extent. Edmund might, in the common phrase, do the duty of Thornton, that is, he might read prayers and preach, without giving up Mansfield Park; he might ride over every Sunday, to a house nominally inhabited, and go through divine service; he might be the clergyman of Thornton Lacey every seventh day, for three or four hours, if that would content him. But it will not. He knows that human nature needs more lessons than a weekly sermon can convey; and that if he does not live among his parishoners, and prove himself, by constant attention, their well-wisher and friend, he does very little either for their good or his own."

[15]

Mr Crawford bowed his acquiescence.

"I repeat again," added Sir Thomas, "that Thornton Lacey is the only house in the neighbourhood in which I should not be happy to wait on Mr Crawford as occupier."

Mr Crawford bowed his thanks.

"Sir Thomas," said Edmund, "undoubtedly understands the duty of a parish priest. We must hope his son may prove that he knows it too."

[16]

Whatever effect Sir Thomas's little harangue might really produce on Mr Crawford, it raised some awkward sensations in two of the others, two of his most attentive listeners-Miss Crawford and Fanny. One of whom, having never before understood that Thornton was so soon and so completely to be his home, was pondering with downcast eyes on what it would be not to see Edmund every day; and the other, startled from the agreeable fancies she had been previously indulging on the strength of her brother's description, no longer able, in the picture she had been forming of a future Thornton, to shut out the church, sink the clergyman, and see only the respectable, elegant, modernized, and occasional residence of a man of independent fortune, was considering Sir Thomas, with decided ill-will, as the destroyer of all this, and suffering the more from that involuntary forbearance which his character and manner commanded, and from not daring to relieve herself by a single attempt at throwing ridicule on his cause.

All the agreeable of her speculation was over for that hour. It was time to have done with cards, if sermons prevailed; and she was glad to find it necessary to come to a conclusion, and be able to refresh her spirits by a change of place and neighbour.

The chief of the party were now collected irregularly round the fire, and waiting the final break-up. William and Fanny were the most detached. They remained together at the otherwise deserted card-table, talking very comfortably, and not thinking of the rest, till some of the rest began to think of them. Henry Crawford's chair was the first to be given a direction towards them, and he sat silently observing them for a few minutes; himself, in the meanwhile, observed by Sir Thomas, who was standing in chat with Dr Grant.

"This is the assembly night," said William. "If I were at Portsmouth I should be at it, perhaps."

"But you do not wish yourself at Portsmouth, William?"

"No, Fanny, that I do not. I shall have enough of Portsmouth and of dancing, too, when I cannot have you. And I do not know that there would be any good in going to the assembly, for I might not get a partner. The Portsmouth girls turn up their noses at anybody who has not a commission. One might as well be nothing as a midshipman. One is nothing, indeed. You remember the Gregorys; they are grown up amazing fine girls, but they will hardly speak to me, because Lucy is courted by a lieutenant."

"Oh! shame, shame! But never mind it, William (her own cheeks in a glow of indignation as she spoke). It is not worth minding. It is no reflection on you; it is no more than what the greatest admirals have all experienced, more or less, in their time. You must think of that, you must try to make up your mind to it as one of the hardships which fall to every sailor's share, like bad weather and hard living, only with this advantage, that there will be an end to it, that there will come a time when you will have nothing of that sort to endure. When you are lieutenant! only think, William, when you are a lieutenant, how little you will care for any nonsense of this kind."

[18]

"I begin to think I shall never be a lieutenant, Fanny. Everybody gets made but me."

"Oh! my dear William, do not talk so; do not be so desponding. My uncle says nothing, but I am sure he will do everything in his power to get you made. He knows, as well as you do, of what consequence it is."

She was checked by the sight of her uncle much nearer to them than she had any suspicion of, and each found it necessary to talk of something else.

"Are you fond of dancing, Fanny?"

"Yes, very; only I am soon tired."

"I should like to go to a ball with you and see you dance. Have you never any balls at Northampton? I should like to see you dance, and I'd dance with you if you would, for nobody would know who I was here, and I should like to be your partner once more; We used to jump about together many a time, did not we? when the hand-organ was in the street? I am a pretty good dancer in my way, but I dare say you are a better." And turning to his uncle, who was now close to them, "Is not Fanny a very good dancer, sir?"

Fanny, in dismay at such an unprecedented question, did not know which way to look, or how to be prepared to answer. Some very grave reproof, or at least the coldest expression of indifference, must be coming to distress her brother, and sink her to the ground. But, on the contrary, it was no worse than, "I am sorry to say that I am unable to answer your question. I have never seen Fanny dance since she was a little girl; but I trust we shall both think she acquits herself like a gentlewoman when we do see her, which, perhaps, we may have an opportunity of doing ere long."

"I have had the pleasure of seeing your sister dance, Mr Price," said Henry Crawford, leaning forward, "and will engage to answer every inquiry which you can make on the subject, to your entire satisfaction. But I believe (seeing Fanny looked distressed) it must be at some other time. There is one person in company who does not like to have Miss Price spoken of."

[20]

True enough, he had once seen Fanny dance; and it was equally true that he would now have answered for her gliding about with quiet, light elegance, and in admirable time; but in fact he could not for the life of him recall what her dancing had been, and rather took it for granted that she had been present than remembered anything about her.

He passed, however, for an admirer of her dancing; and Sir Thomas, by no means displeased, prolonged the conversation on dancing in general, and was so well engaged in describing the balls of Antigua, and listening to what his nephew could relate of the different modes of dancing which had fallen within his observation, that he had not heard his carriage announced, and was first called to the knowledge of it by the bustle of Mrs Noris.

"Come, Fanny, Fanny, what are you about? We are going. Do not you see your aunt is going? Quick, quick! I cannot bear to keep good old Wilcox waiting. You should always remember the coachman and horses. My dear Sir Thomas, we have settled it that the carriage should come back for you, and Edmund and William."

Sir Thomas could not dissent, as it had been his own arrangement, previously communicated to his wife and sister; but that seemed forgotten by Mrs Norris, who must fancy that she settled it all herself.

[21]

Fanny's last feeling in the visit was disappointment: for the shawl which Edmund was quietly taking from the servant to bring and put round her shoulders was seized by Mr Crawford's quicker hand, and she was obliged to be indebted to his more prominent attention.

CHAPTER XXVI.

WILLIAM'S desire of seeing Fanny dance made more than a momentary impression on his uncle. The hope of an opportunity, which Sir Thomas had then given, was not given to be thought of no more. He remained steadily inclined to gratify so amiable a feeling; to gratify anybody else who might wish to see Fanny dance, and to give pleasure to the young people in general; and having thought the matter over, and taken his resolution in quiet independence, the result of it appeared the next morning at breakfast, when, after recalling and commending what his nephew had said, he added, "I do not like, William, that you should leave Northamptonshire without this indulgence. It would give me pleasure to see you both dance. You spoke of the balls at Northampton. Your cousins have occasionally attended them; but they would not altogether suit us now. The fatigue would be too much for your aunt. I believe we must not think of a Northampton ball. A dance at home would be more eligible; and if—"

[22]

"Ah, my dear Sir Thomas!" interrupted Mrs Norris, "I knew what was coming. I knew what you were going to say. If dear Julia were at home, or dearest Mrs Rushworth at Sotherton, to afford a reason, an occasion for such a thing, you would be tempted to give the young people a dance at Mansfield. I know you would. If they were at home to grace the ball, a ball you would have this very Christmas. Thank your uncle, William, thank your uncle!"

"My daughters," replied Sir Thomas, gravely interposing, "have their pleasures at Brighton, and I hope are very happy; but the dance which I think of giving at Mansfield will be for their cousins. Could we be all assembled, our satisfaction would undoubtedly be more complete, but the absence of some is not to debar the others of amusement."

Mrs Norris had not another word to say. She saw decision in his looks, and her surprize and vexation required some minutes' silence to be settled into composure. A ball at such a time!

His daughters absent and herself not consulted! There was comfort, however, soon at hand. She must be the doer of everything: Lady Bertram would of course be spared all thought and exertion, and it would all fall upon her. She should have to do the honours of the evening; and this reflection quickly restored so much of her good humour as enabled her to join in with the others, before their happiness and thanks were all expressed.

Edmund, William, and Fanny did, in their different ways, look and speak as much grateful pleasure in the promised ball as Sir Thomas could desire. Edmund's feelings were for the other two. His father had never conferred a favour or shown a kindness more to his satisfaction.

Lady Bertram was perfectly quiescent and contented, and had no objections to make. Sir Thomas engaged for its giving her very little trouble; and she assured him "that she was not at all afraid of the trouble; indeed she could not imagine there would be any."

Mrs Norris was ready with her suggestions as to the rooms he would think fittest to be used, but found it all pre-arranged; and when she would have conjectured and hinted about the day, it appeared that the day was settled too. Sir Thomas had been amusing himself with [24] shaping a very complete outline of the business; and as soon as she would listen quietly, could read his list of the families to be invited, from whom he calculated, with all necessary allowance for the shortness of the notice, to collect young people enough to form twelve or fourteen couple: and could detail the considerations which had induced him to fix on the 22d as the most eligible day. William was required to be at Portsmouth on the 24th: the 22d would therefore be the last day of his visit; but where the days were so few it would be unwise to fix on any earlier. Mrs Norris was obliged to be satisfied with thinking just the same, and with having been on the point of proposing the 22d herself, as by far the best day for the purpose.

The ball was now a settled thing, and before the evening a proclaimed thing to all whom it concerned. Invitations were sent with dispatch, and many a young lady went to bed that night with her head full of happy cares as well as Fanny. To her, the cares were sometimes almost beyond the happiness; for young and inexperienced, with small means of choice, and no confidence in her own taste, the "how she should be dressed," was a point of painful solicitude; and the almost solitary ornament in her possession, a very pretty amber cross which William had brought her from Sicily, was the greatest distress of all, for she had nothing but a bit of ribbon to fasten it to; and though she had worn it in that manner once, would it be allowable at such a time, in the midst of all the rich ornaments which she supposed all the other young ladies would appear in? And yet not to wear it! William had wanted to buy her a gold chain too, but the purchase had been beyond his means, and therefore not to wear the cross might be mortifying him. These were anxious considerations; enough to sober her spirits even under the prospect of a ball given principally for her gratification.

The preparations meanwhile went on, and Lady Bertram continued to sit on her sofa without any inconvenience from them. She had some extra visits from the housekeeper, and her maid was rather hurried in making up a new dress for her: Sir Thomas gave orders, and Mrs Norris ran about; but all this gave her no trouble, and as she had foreseen, "there was, in fact, no trouble in the business."

Edmund was at this time particularly full of cares; his mind being deeply occupied in the consideration of two important events now at hand, which were to fix his fate in life—ordination and matrimony—events of such a serious character as to make the ball, which would be very quickly followed by one of them, appear [26]

f less moment in his eyes than in those of any her person in the house. On the 23d he was oing to a friend near Peterborough, in the same tuation as himself, and they were to receive dination in the course of the Christmas week. [alf his destiny would then be determined, but e other half might not be so very smoothly ooed. His duties would be established, but e wife who was to share, and animate, and reard those duties, might yet be unattainable. Ie knew his own mind, but he was not always erfectly assured of knowing Miss Crawford's. here were points on which they did not quite gree; there were moments in which she did not eem propitious; and though trusting altogether her affection, so far as to be resolved (almost esolved) on bringing it to a decision within a ery short time, as soon as the variety of business efore him were arranged, and he knew what he ad to offer her, he had many anxious feelings, nany doubting hours as to the result. His coniction of her regard for him was sometimes ery strong; he could look back on a long course f encouragement, and she was as perfect in disnterested attachment as in everything else. But t other times doubt and alarm intermingled vith his hopes; and when he thought of her acnowledged disinclination for privacy and rerement, her decided preference of a London life, what could he expect but a determined rejection? unless it were an acceptance even more to be deprecated, demanding such sacrifices of situation and employment on his side as conscience must forbid.

[27]

The issue of all depended on one question. Did she love him well enough to forego what had used to be essential points? Did she love him well enough to make them no longer essential? And this question, which he was continually repeating to himself, though oftenest answered with a "Yes," had sometimes its "No."

Miss Crawford was soon to leave Mansfield, and on this circumstance the "no" and the "ves" had been very recently in alternation. He had seen her eyes sparkle as she spoke of the dear friend's letter, which claimed a long visit from her in London, and of the kindness of Henry, in engaging to remain where he was till January, that he might convey her thither; he had heard her speak of the pleasure of such a journey with an animation which had "no" in every tone. But this had occured on the first day of its being settled, within the first hour of the burst of such enjoyment, when nothing but the friends she was to visit was before her. He had since heard her express herself differently, with other feelings, more chequered feelings; he had heard her tell Mrs Grant that she should leave her with regret; that she began to believe neither the friends nor the pleasures she was going to were worth those she left behind; and that though she felt she must go, and knew she should enjoy herself when once away, she was already looking forward to being at Mansfield again. Was there not a "yes" in all this?

[28]

With such matters to ponder over, and arrange, and re-arrange, Edmund could not, on his own account, think very much of the evening which the rest of the family were looking forward to with a more equal degree of strong interest. Independent of his two cousins enjoyment in it, the evening was to him of no higher value than any other appointed meeting of the two families might be. In every meeting there was a hope of receiving further confirmation of Miss Crawford's attachment; but the whirl of a ball-room, perhaps, was not particularly favourable to the excitement or expression of serious feelings. To engage her early for the two first dances, was all the command of individual happiness which he felt in his power, and the only preparation for the ball which he could enter into, in spite of all that was passing around him on the subject, from morning till night.

Tuesday was the day of the ball, and on Wednesday morning, Fanny, still unable to satisfy herself as to what she ought to wear, determined to seek counsel of the more enlightened, and apply to Mrs Grant and her sister, whose acknowledged taste would certainly bear her blameless; and as Edmund and William were gone to Northampton, and she had reason to think Mr Crawford likewise out, she walked down to the Parsonage without much fear of wanting an opportunity for private discussion; and the privacy of such a discussion was a most important part of it to Fanny, being more than half ashamed of her own solicitude.

[29]

She met Miss Crawford within a few yards of the Parsonage, just setting out to call on her. and as it seemed to her, that her friend, though obliging to insist on turning back, was unwilling to lose her walk, she explained her business at once, and observed, that if she would be so kind as to give her opinion, it might be all talked over as well without doors as within. Miss Crawford appeared gratified by the application, and after a moment's thought urged Fanny's returning with her in a much more cordial manner than before, and proposed their going up into her room, where they might have a comfortable coze without disturbing Dr and Mrs Grant, who were together in the drawing-room. It was just the plan to suit Fanny; and with a great deal of gratitude on her side for such ready and kind attention, they proceeded in doors, and upstairs, and were soon deep in the interesting subject. Miss Crawford, pleased with the appeal, gave her all her best judgment and taste, made everything easy by her suggestions, and tried to make everything agreeable by her encouragement. The dress being settled in all its grander parts-"But what shall you have by way of necklace?" said Miss Crawford. "Shall not you wear your brother's cross?" And as she spoke she was undoing a small parcel, which Fanny had observed in her hand when they had met. Fanny acknowledged her wishes and doubts on this point; she did not know how either to wear the cross, or to refrain from wearing it. She was answered by having a small trinket-box placed before her, and being requested to chuse from among several gold chains and necklaces. Such had been the parcel with which Miss Crawford was provided, and such the object of her intended visit: and in the kindest manner she now urged Fanny's taking one and to keep for her sake, saying everything she could think of to obviate the scruples which were making Fanny start back at first with a look of horror at the proposal.

[30]

"You see what a collection I have," said she, "more by half than I ever use or think of. I do not offer them as new. I offer nothing but an old necklace. You must forgive the liberty, and oblige me."

Fanny still resisted, and from her heart. The gift was too valuable. But Miss Crawford persevered, and argued the case with so much affectionate earnestness through all the heads of William and the cross, and the ball, and herself, as to be finally successful. Fanny found herself obliged to yield, that she might not be accused of pride or indifference, or some other littleness; and having with modest reluctance given her consent, proceeded to make the selection. She looked and looked, longing to know which might be least valuable; and was determined in her choice at last, by fancying there was one necklace more frequently placed before her eyes than the rest. It was of gold, prettily worked; and though Fanny would have preferred a longer and plainer chain as more adapted for her purpose, she hoped, in fixing on this, to be chusing what Miss Crawford least wished to keep. Miss Crawford smiled her perfect approbation; and hastened to complete the gift by putting the necklace round her, and making her see how well it looked. Fanny had not a word to say against its becomingness, and excepting what remained of her scruples, was exceedingly pleased with an acquisition so very apropos. She would rather perhaps have been obliged to some other person. But this was an unworthy feeling. Miss Crawford had anticipated her wants with a kindness which proved her a real friend. "When I wear this necklace I shall always think of you," said she, "and feel how very kind you were."

[32]

"You must think of somebody else, too, when you wear that necklace," replied Miss Crawford. "You must think of Henry, for it was his choice in the first place. He gave it to me, and with the necklace I make over to you all the duty of remembering the original giver. It is to be a family remembrancer. The sister is not to be in your mind without bringing the brother too."

Fanny, in great astonishment and confusion, would have returned the present instantly. To take what had been the gift of another person, of a brother too, impossible! it must not be! and with an eagerness and embarrassment quite diverting to her companion, she laid down the necklace again on its cotton, and seemed resolved either to take another or none at all. Miss Crawford thought she had never seen a prettier consciousness. "My dear child," said she, laughing, "what are you afraid of? Do you think Henry will claim the necklace as mine, and fancy you did not come honestly by it? or are you imagining he would be too much flattered by seeing round your lovely throat, an ornament which his money purchased three years ago, before he knew there was such a throat in the world? or perhaps—looking archly—you suspect a confederacy between us, and that what I am now doing is with his knowledge and at his desire?"

With the deepest blushes Fanny protested against such thought.

"Well, then," replied Miss Crawford more seriously, but without at all believing her, "to convince me that you suspect no trick, and are as unsuspicious of compliment as I have always found you, take the necklace and say no more about it. Its being a gift of my brother's need not make the smallest difference in your accept ing it, as I assure you it makes none in my willing ness to part with it. He is always giving me something or other. I have such innumerable presents from him that it is quite impossible for me to value, or for him to remember half. And as for this necklace, I do not suppose I have work it six times; it is very pretty, but I never think of it; and though you would be most heartily welcome to any other in my trinket-box, you have happened to fix on the very one which, i I have a choice, I would rather part with and se in your possession than any other. Say no mor against it, I entreat you. Such a trifle is no worth half so many words."

Fanny dared not make any further opposition and with renewed but less happy thanks accepted the necklace again, for there was an expression in Miss Crawford's eyes which she could not be satisfied with.

[34]

It was impossible for her to be insensible of Mr Crawford's change of manners. She had long seen it. He evidently tried to please her; he was gallant, he was attentive, he was something like what he had been to her cousins: he wanted, she supposed, to cheat her of her tranquillity as he had cheated them; and whether he might not have some concern in this necklace— She could not be convinced that he had not, for Miss Crawford, complaisant as a sister, was careless as a woman and a friend.

Reflecting and doubting, and feeling that the possession of what she had so much wished for did not bring much satisfaction, she now walked home again, with a change rather than a diminution of cares since her treading that path before.

CHAPTER XXVII.

N reaching home, Fanny went immediately up stairs to deposit this unexpected acquisition, this doubtful good of a necklace, in some favourite box in the East room, which held all her smaller treasures; but on opening the door, what was her surprize to find her cousin Edmund there writing at the table! Such a sight having never occurred before, was almost as wonderful as it was welcome.

"Fanny," said he directly, leaving his seat and his pen, and meeting her with something in his hand, "I beg your pardon for being here. I come to look for you, and after waiting a little while in hope of your coming in, was making use of your inkstand to explain my errand. You will find the beginning of a note to yourself; but I can now speak my business, which is merely to beg your acceptance of this little trifle: a chain for William's cross. You ought to have had it a week ago, but there has been a delay from my brother's not being in town by several days so soon as I expected; and I have only just now received it at Northampton. I hope you will like the chain itself, Fanny. I endeavoured to consult the simplicity of your taste; but at any rate I know you will be kind to my intentions, and consider it, as it really is, a token of the love of one of your oldest friends."

And so saying, he was hurrying away, before Fanny, overpowered by a thousand feelings of pain and pleasure, could attempt to speak; but quickened by one sovereign wish she then called out, "Oh! cousin, stop a moment, pray stop!"

He turned back.

[36]

"I cannot attempt to thank you,"she continued, in a very agitated manner; "thanks are out of the question. I feel much more than I can possibly express. Your goodness in thinking of me in such a way is beyond-----"

"If that is all you have to say, Fanny----" smiling and turning away again.

"No, no, it is not. I want to consult you."

Almost unconsciously she had now undone the parcel he had just put into her hand, and seeing before her, in all the niceness of jewellers' packing, a plain gold chain, perfectly simple and neat, she could not help bursting forth again, "Oh, this is beautiful, indeed! This is the very thing, precisely what I wished for! This is the only ornament I have ever had a desire to possess. It will exactly suit my cross. They must and shall be worn together. It comes, too, in such an acceptable moment. Oh, cousin, you do not know how acceptable it is."

"My dear Fanny, you feel these things a great deal too much. I am most happy that you like the chain, and that it should be here in time for to-morrow; but your thanks are far beyond the occasion. Believe me, I have no pleasure in the world superior to that of contributing to yours. No, I can safely say, I have no pleasure so complete, so unalloyed. It is without a drawback."

Upon such expressions of affection, Fanny could have lived an hour without saying another word; but Edmund, after waiting a moment, obliged her to bring down her mind from its heavenly flight, by saying, "But what is it that you want to consult me about?"

It was about the necklace, which she was now most earnestly longing to return, and hoped to obtain his approbation of her doing. She gave the history of her recent visit, and now her raptures might well be over; for Edmund was so struck with the circumstance, so delighted with what Miss Crawford had done, so gratified by such a coincidence of conduct between them, that Fanny could not but admit the superior power of one pleasure over his own mind, though it might have its drawback. It was some time before she could get his attention to her plan, or any answer to her demand of his opinion: he was in a reverie of fond reflection, uttering only now and then a few half sentences of praise; but when he did awake and understand, he was very decided in opposing what she wished.

"Return the necklace! No, my dear Fanny, upon no account. It would be mortifying her severely. There can hardly be a more unpleasant sensation than the having anything returned on our hands which we have given with a reasonable hope of its contributing to the comfort of a friend. Why should she lose a pleasure which she has shown herself so deserving of?"

[38]

"If it had been given to me in the first instance," said Fanny, "I should not have thought of returning it; but being her brother's present, is not it fair to suppose that she would rather not part with it, when it is not wanted?"

"She must not suppose it not wanted, not acceptable, at least; and its having been originally her brother's gift makes no difference; for she was not prevented from offering, nor you from taking it on that account, it ought not to prevent you from keeping it. No doubt it is handsomer than mine, and fitter for a ball-room."

"No, it is not handsomer, not at all handsomer in its way, and, for my purpose, not half so fit. The chain will agree with William's cross beyond all comparison better than the necklace."

"For one night, Fanny, for only one night, if it be a sacrifice; I am sure you will, upon consideration, make the sacrifice rather than give pain to one who has been so studious of your comfort. Miss Crawford's attentions to you have been—not more than you were justly entitled to—I am the last person to think that could be, but they have been invariable; and to be returning them with what must have something the air of ingratitude, though I know it could never have the meaning, is not in your nature, I am sure.

[39]

Wear the necklace, as you are engaged to do, to-morrow evening, and let the chain, which was not ordered with any reference to the ball, be kept for commoner occasions. This is my advice. I would not have the shadow of a coolness between the two whose intimacy I have been observing with the greatest pleasure, and in whose characters there is so much general resemblance in true generosity and natural delicacy as to make the few slight differences, resulting principally from situation, no reasonable hindrance to a perfect friendship. I would not have the shadow of a coolness arise," he repeated, his voice sinking a little, "between the two dearest objects I have on earth."

He was gone as he spoke; and Fanny remained to tranquillise herself as she could. She was one of his two dearest; that must support her. But the other: the first! She had never heard him speak so openly before, and though it told her no more than what she had long perceived, it was a stab, for it told of his own convictions and views. They were decided. He would marry Miss Crawford. It was a stab in spite of every long-standing expectation; and she was obliged to repeat again and again, that she was one of his two dearest, before the words gave her any sensation. Could she believe Miss Crawford to deserve him, it would be—oh, how different would it be—how far more tolerable! But he was deceived in her; he gave her merits which she had not; her faults were what they had ever been, but he saw them no longer. Till she had shed many tears over this deception, Fanny could not subdue her agitation; and the dejection which followed could only be relieved by the influence of fervent prayers for his happiness.

[40]

It was her intention, as she felt it to be her duty, to try to overcome all that was excessive, all that bordered on selfishness, in her affection for Edmund. To call or fancy it a loss, a disappointment, would be a presumption for which she had not words strong enough to satisfy her own humility. To think of him as Miss Crawford might be justified in thinking, would in her be insanity. To her he could be nothing under any circumstances; nothing dearer than a friend. Why did such an idea occur to her even enough to be reprobated and forbidden? It ought not to have touched on the confines of her imagination. She would endeavour to be rational, and to deserve the right of judging of Miss Crawford's character, and the privilege of true solicitude for him by a sound intellect and an honest heart.

She had all the heroism of principle, and was determined to do her duty; but having also many of the feelings of youth and nature, let her not be much wondered at, if, after making all these good resolutions on the side of self-government. she seized the scrap of paper on which Edmund had begun writing to her, as a treasure beyond all her hopes, and reading with the tenderest emotion these words, "My very dear Fanny, you must do me the favour to accept-" locked it up with the chain, as the dearest part of the gift. It was the only thing approaching to a letter which she had ever received from him; she might never receive another; it was impossible that she ever should receive another so perfectly gratifying in the occasion and the style. Two lines more prized had never fallen from the pen of the most distinguished author-never more completely blessed the researches of the fondest biographer. The enthusiasm of a woman's love is beyond that of a biographer's. To her, the hand-writing itself, independent of anything it may convey, is a blessedness. Never were such characters cut by any other human being, as Edmund's commonest handwriting gave! This specimen, written in haste as it was, had not a fault; and there was a felicity in the flow of the first four words, in the arrangement of "My very dear Fanny," which she could have looked at for ever.

Having regulated her thoughts and comforted her feelings by this happy mixture of reason and weakness, she was able, in due time, to go down and resume her usual employments near her aunt Bertram, and pay her the usual observances without any apparent want of spirits.

[42]

Thursday, predestined to hope and enjoyment, came; and opened with more kindness to Fanny than such self-willed, unmanageable days often volunteer, for soon after breakfast a very friendly note was brought from Mr Crawford to William, stating that as he found himself obliged to go to London on the morrow for a few days, he could not help trying to procure a companion; and therefore hoped that if William could make up his mind to leave Mansfield half a day earlier than had been proposed, he would accept a place in his carriage. Mr Crawford meant to be in town by his uncle's accustomary late dinner hour, and William was invited to dine with him at the Admiral's. The proposal was a very pleasant one to William himself, who enjoyed the idea of travelling post with four horses, and such a goodhumoured, agreeable friend; and, in likening it to going up with dispatches, was saying at once everything in favour of its happiness and dignity which his imagination could suggest; and Fanny, from a different motive, was exceedingly pleased; for the original plan was that William should go up by the mail from Northampton the following night, which would not have allowed him an hour's rest before he must have got into a Portsmouth coach; and though this offer of Mr Crawford's would rob her of many hours of his company, she was too happy in having William spared from the fatigue of such a journey, to think of anything else. Sir Thomas approved of it for another reason. His nephew's introduction to Admiral Crawford might be of service. The Admiral, he believed, had interest. Upon the whole, it was a very joyous note. Fanny's spirits lived on it half the morning, deriving some accession of pleasure from its writer being himself to go away.

As for the ball, so near at hand, she had too many agitations and fears to have half the enjoyment in anticipation which she ought to have had, or must have been supposed to have, by the many young ladies looking forward to the same event in situations more at ease, but under circumstances of less novelty, less interest, less peculiar gratification, than would be attributed to her. Miss Price, known only by name to half the people invited, was now to make her first appearance, and must be regarded as the queen of the evening. Who could be happier than Miss Price? But Miss Price had not been brought up to the trade of coming out; and had she known in what light this ball was, in general, considered respecting her, it would very much have lessened her comfort by increasing the fears she already had, of doing wrong and being looked at. To dance without much observation or any extraordinary fatigue, to have strength and partners for about half the evening, to dance a little with Edmund, and not a great deal with Mr Crawford, to see William enjoy himself, and be able to keep away from her aunt Norris, was the height of her ambition, and seemed to comprehend her greatest possibility of happiness. As these were the best of her hopes, they could not always prevail; and in the course of a long morning, spent principally with her two aunts, she was often under the influence of much less sanguine views. William determined to make this day a day of thorough enjoyment, was out snipeshooting; Edmund, she had too much reason to suppose, was at the Parsonage; and left alone to bear the worrying of Mrs Norris, who was cross because the housekeeper would have her own way with the supper, and whom she could not avoid though the housekeeper might, Fanny was worn down at last to think everything an evil belonging to the ball, and when sent off with a parting worry to dress, moved as languidly towards her own room, and felt as incapable of happiness as if she had been allowed no share in it.

[44]

As she walked slowly upstairs she thought of yesterday; it had been about the same hour that she had returned from the Parsonage, and found Edmund in the East room. "Suppose I were to find him there again to-day!" said she to herself, in a fond indulgence of fancy.

"Fanny," said a voice at that moment near her. Starting and looking up, she saw, across the lobby she had just reached, Edmund, himself, standing at the head of a different staircase. He came towards her. "You look tired and fagged, Fanny. You have been walking too far."

"No, I have not been out at all."

"Then you have had fatigues within doors, which are worse. You had better have gone out."

Fanny, not liking to complain, found it easiest to make no answer; and though he looked at her with his usual kindness, she believed he had soon ceased to think of her countenance. He did not appear in spirits; something unconnected with her was probably amiss. They proceeded upstairs together, their rooms being on the same floor above.

"I come from Dr Grant's," said Edmund, presently. "You may guess my errand there, Fanny." And he looked so conscious, that Fanny could think but of one errand, which turned her too sick for speech. "I wished to engage Miss Crawford for the two first dances," was the explanation that followed, and brought Fanny to life again, enabling her, as she found she was expected to speak, to utter something like an inquiry as to the result.

[46]

"Yes," he answered, "she is engaged to me; but (with a smile that did not sit easy) she says it is to be the last time that she ever will dance with me. She is not serious. I think, I hope, I am sure she is not serious; but I would rather not hear it. She never has danced with a clergyman, she says, and she never will. For my own sake, I could wish there had been no ball just at —I mean not this very week, this very day; tomorrow I leave home."

Fanny struggled for speech, and said, "I am very sorry that anything has occurred to distress you. This ought to be a day of pleasure. My uncle meant it so."

"Oh yes, yes! and it will be a day of pleasure. It will all end right. I am only vexed for a moment. In fact, it is not that I consider the ball as ill-timed; what does it signify? But, Fanny," stopping her, by taking her hand, and speaking low and seriously, "you know what all this means. You see how it is; and could tell me, perhaps better than I could tell you, how and why I am vexed. Let me talk to you a little. You are a kind, kind listener. I have been pained by her manner this morning, and cannot get the better of it. I know her disposition to be as sweet and faultless as your own, but the influence of her former companions makes her seem—gives to her conversation, to her professed opinions, sometimes a tinge of wrong. She does not think evil, but she speaks it, speaks it in playfulness; and though I know it to be playfulness, it grieves me to the soul."

[47]

"The effect of education," said Fanny gently.

Edmund could not but agree to it. "Yes, that uncle and aunt! They have injured the finest mind; for sometimes, Fanny, I own to you, it does appear more than manner; it appears as if the mind itself was tainted."

Fanny imagined this to be an appeal to her judgment, and therefore, after a moment's consideration, said, "If you only want me as a listener, cousin, I will be as useful as I can; but I am not qualified for an adviser. Do not ask advice of me. I am not competent."

"You are right, Fanny, to protest against such an office, but you need not be afraid. It is a subject on which I should never ask advice; it is the sort of subject on which it had better never be asked; and few, I imagine, do ask it, but when they want to be influenced against their conscience. I only want to talk to you."

"One thing more. Excuse the liberty; but take care how you talk to me. Do not tell me anything now, which hereafter you may be sorry for. The time may come----"

[48]

The colour rushed into her cheeks as she spoke.

"Dearest Fanny!" cried Edmund, pressing her hand to his lips with almost as much warmth as if it had been Miss Crawford's, "you are all considerate thought! But it is unnecessary here. The time will never come. No such time as you allude to will ever come. I begin to think it most improbable; the chances grow less and less: and even if it should, there will be nothing to be remembered by either you or me that we need be afraid of, for I can never be ashamed of my own scruples; and if they are removed, it must be by changes that will only raise her character the more by the recollection of the faults she once had. You are the only being upon earth to whom I should say what I have said; but you have always known my opinion of her; you can bear me witness, Fanny, that I have never been blinded. How many a time have we talked over her little errors! You need not fear me; I have almost given up every serious idea of her; but I must be a blockhead indeed, if, whatever befell me, I could think of your kindness and sympathy without the sincerest gratitude."

He had said enough to shake the experience of eighteen. He had said enough to give Fanny some happier feelings than she had lately known, and with a brighter look, she answered, "Yes, cousin, I am convinced that you would be incapable of anything else, though perhaps some might not. I cannot be afraid of hearing anything you wish to say. Do not check yourself. Tell me whatever you like."

They were now on the second floor, and the appearance of a housemaid prevented any further conversation. For Fanny's present comfort it was concluded, perhaps, at the happiest moment: had he been able to talk another five minutes, there is no saying that he might not have talked away all Miss Crawford's faults and his own despondence. But as it was, they parted with looks on his side of grateful affection, and with some very precious sensations on her's. She had felt nothing like it for hours. Since the first joy from Mr Crawford's note to William had worn away, she had been in a state absolutely their reverse; there had been no comfort around, no hope within her. Now everything was smiling. William's good fortune returned again upon her mind and seemed of greater value than at first. The ball, too-such an evening of pleasure before her! It was now a real animation; and she began to dress for it with much of the happy flutter which belongs to a ball. All went well; she did not dislike her own looks; and when she came to the necklace [50] again, her good fortune seemed complete, for upon trial the one given her by Miss Crawford would by no means go through the ring of the cross. She had, to oblige Edmund, resolved to wear it; but it was too large for the purpose. His, therefore, must be worn; and having, with delightful feelings, joined the chain and the cross -those memorials of two most beloved of her heart, those dearest tokens so formed for each other by everything real and imaginary-and put them round her neck, and seen and felt how full of William and Edmund they were, she was able, without an effort, to resolve on wearing Miss Crawford's necklace too. She acknowledged it to be right. Miss Crawford had a claim; and when it was no longer to encroach on, to interfere with the stronger claims, the truer kindness of another, she could do her justice even with pleasure to herself. The necklace really looked very well; and Fanny left her room at last, comfortably satisfied with herself and all about her.

Her aunt Bertram had recollected her on this occasion with an unusual degree of wakefulness. It had really occurred to her, unprompted, that Fanny, preparing for a ball, might be glad of better help than the upper housemaid's, and when dressed herself, she actually sent her own maid to assist her; too late, of course, to be of any use.

Mrs Chapman had just reached the attic floo when Miss Price came out of her room completel dressed, and only civilities were necessary; bu Fanny felt her aunt's attention almost as muc as Lady Bertram or Mrs Chapman could d themselves.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

ER uncle and both her aunts were in th drawing-room when Fanny went down

To the former she was an interesting object, and he saw with pleasure the general ele gance of her appearance, and her being in re markably good looks. The neatness and propriety of her dress was all that he would allow himself to commend in her presence, but upon her leaving the room again soon afterwards, he spoke of her beauty with very decided praise. "Yes," said Lady Bertram, "she looks very well. I sent Chapman to her."

"Look well! Oh, yes!" cried Mrs Norris, "she has good reason to look well with all her advantages; brought up in this family as she has been, with all the benefit of her cousins' manners before her. Only think, my dear Sir Thomas, what extraordinary advantages you and I have been the means of giving her. The very gown you have been taking notice of is your own generous present to her when dear Mrs Rushworth married. What would she have been if we had not taken her by the hand?"

[52]

Sir Thomas said no more; but when they sat down to table the eyes of the two young men assured him that the subject might be gently touched again when the ladies withdrew, with more success. Fanny saw that she was approved; and the consciousness of looking well made her look still better. From a variety of causes she was happy, and she was soon made still happier; for in following her aunts out of the room, Edmund, who was holding open the door, said, as she passed him, "You must dance with me, Fanny; you must keep two dances for me; any two that you like, except the first." She had nothing more to wish for. She had hardly ever been in a state so nearly approaching high spirits in her life. Her cousin's former gaiety on the day of a ball was no longer surprizing to her; she felt it to be indeed very charming, and was actually practising her steps about the drawing-room as long as she could be safe from the notice of her aunt Norris, who was entirely taken up at first in fresh arranging and injuring the noble fire which the butler had prepared.

Half an hour followed, that would have been at least languid under any circumstances, but

[53]

Fanny's happiness still prevailed. It was but to think of her conversation with Edmund; and what was the restlessness of Mrs Norris? What were the yawns of Lady Bertram?

The gentlemen joined them; and soon after began the sweet expectation of a carriage, when a general spirit of ease and enjoyment seemed diffused, and they all stood about and talked and laughed, and every moment had its pleasure and its hope. Fanny felt that there must be a struggle in Edmund's cheerfulness, but it was delightful to see the effort so successfully made.

When the carriages were really heard, when the guests began really to assemble, her own gaiety of heart was much subdued: the sight of so many strangers threw her back into herself; and besides the gravity and formality of the first great circle, which the manners of neither Sir Thomas nor Lady Bertram were of a kind to do away, she found herself occasionally called on to endure something worse. She was introduced here and there by her uncle, and forced to be spoken to, and to courtesy, and speak again. This was a hard duty, and she was never summoned to it without looking at William, as he walked about at his ease in the background of the scene, and longing to be with him.

The entrance of the Grants and Crawfords was a favourable epoch. The stiffness of the [54] meeting soon gave way before their popular manners and more diffused intimacies: little groups were formed, and everybody grew comfortable. Fanny felt the advantage; and, drawing back from the toils of civility, would have been again most happy, could she have kept her eyes from wandering between Edmund and Mary Crawford. She looked all loveliness-and what might not be the end of it? Her own musings were brought to an end on perceiving Mr Crawford before her, and her thoughts were put into another channel by his engaging her almost instantly for the first two dances. Her happiness on this occasion was very much à-lamortal, finely chequered. To be secure of a partner at first was a most essential good-for the moment of beginning was now growing seriously near; and she so little understood her own claims as to think that if Mr Crawford had not asked her, she must have been the last to be sought after, and should have received a partner only through a series of inquiry, and bustle, and interference, which would have been terrible; but at the same time there was a pointedness in his manner of asking her which she did not like, and she saw the eye glancing for a moment at . her necklace, with a smile-she thought there was a smile-which made her blush and feel wretched. And though there was no second glance to disturb her, though his object seemed then to be only quietly agreeable, she could not get the better of her embarrassment, heightened as it was by the idea of his perceiving it, and had no composure till he turned away to some one else. Then she could gradually rise up to the genuine satisfaction of having a partner, a voluntary partner, secured against the dancing began.

[55]

When the company were moving into the ballroom, she found herself for the first time near Miss Crawford, whose eyes and smiles were immediately and more unequivocally directed as her brother's had been, and who was beginning to speak on the subject, when Fanny, anxious to get the story over, hastened to give the explanation of the second necklace: the real chain. Miss Crawford listened; and all her intended compliments and insinuations to Fanny were forgotten: she felt only one thing; and her eyes, bright as they had been before, shewing they could yet be brighter, she exclaimed with eager pleasure, "Did he? Did Edmund? That was like himself. No other man would have thought of it. I honour him beyond expression." And she looked around as if longing to tell him so. He was not near, he was attending a party of ladies out of the room; and Mrs Grant coming up to the two girls, and taking an arm of each, they followed with the rest.

[56]

Fanny's heart sunk, but there was no leisure for thinking long even of Miss Crawford's feelings. They were in the ball-room, the violins were playing, and her mind was in a flutter that forbad its fixing on anything serious. She must watch the general arrangements, and see how everything was done.

In a few minutes Sir Thomas came to her, and asked if she were engaged; and the "Yes, sir; to Mr Crawford," was exactly what he had intended to hear. Mr Crawford was not far off: Sir Thomas brought him to her, saying something which discovered to Fanny that she was to lead the way and open the ball; an idea that had never occurred to her before. Whenever she had thought of the minutiæ of the evening, it had been as a matter of course that Edmund would begin with Miss Crawford; and the impression was so strong, that though her uncle spoke the contrary, she could not help an exclamation of surprize, a hint of her unfitness, an entreaty even to be excused. To be urging her opinion against Sir Thomas's, was a proof of the extremity of the case; but such was her horror at the first suggestion, that she could actually look him in the face and say that she hoped it might be settled otherwise; in vain, however; Sir Thomas smiled, tried to encourage her, and then looked too serious, and said too decidedly--"It must be so, my dear," for her to hazard another word; and she found herself the next moment conducted by Mr Crawford to the top of the room, and standing there to be joined by the rest of the dancers, couple after couple as they were formed.

[57]

She could hardly believe it. To be placed above so many elegant young women! The distinction was too great. It was treating her like her cousins! And her thoughts flew to those absent cousins with most unfeigned and truly tender regret, that they were not at home to take their own place in the room, and have their share of a pleasure which would have been so very delightful to them. So often as she had heard them wish for a ball at home as the greatest of all felicities! And to have them away when it was given-and for her to be opening the balland with Mr Crawford too! She hoped they would not envy her that distinction now; but when she looked back to the state of things in the autumn, to what they had all been to each other when once dancing in that house before, the present arrangement was almost more than she could understand herself.

The ball began. It was rather honour than happiness to Fanny, for the first dance at least: her partner was in excellent spirits, and tried to impart them to her; but she was a great deal too much frightened to have any enjoyment, till she [58] could suppose herself no longer looked at. Young, pretty, and gentle, however, she had no awkwardnesses that were not as good as graces, and there were few persons present that were not disposed to praise her. She was attractive, she was modest, she was Sir Thomas's niece, and she was soon said to be admired by Mr Crawford. It was enough to give her general favour. Sir Thomas himself was watching her progress down the dance with much complacency; he was proud of his niece; and without attributing all her personal beauty, as Mrs Norris seemed to do, to her transplantation to Mansfield, he was pleased with himself for having supplied everything else: education and manners she owed to him.

Miss Crawford saw much of Sir Thomas's thoughts as he stood, and having in spite of all his wrongs towards her, a general prevailing desire of recommending herself to him, took an opportunity of stepping aside to say something agreeable of Fanny. Her praise was warm, and he received it as she could wish, joining in it as far as discretion, and politeness, and slowness of speech would allow, and certainly appearing to greater advantage on the subject than his lady did soon afterwards, when Mary, perceiving her on a sofa very near, turned round before she began to dance, to compliment her on Miss Price's looks.

"Yes, she does look very well," was Lady Bertram's placid reply. "Chapman helped her to dress. I sent Chapman to her." Not but that she was really pleased to have Fanny admired; but she was so much more struck with her own kindness in sending Chapman to her, that she could not get it out of her head.

Miss Crawford knew Mrs Norris too well to think of gratifying her by commendation of Fanny; to her, it was as the occasion offered— "Ah! ma'am, how much we want dear Mrs Rushworth and Julia to-night!" and Mrs Norris paid her with as many smiles and courteous words as she had time for, amid so much occupation as she found for herself in making up card-tables, giving hints to Sir Thomas, and trying to move all the chaperons to a better part of the room.

Miss Crawford blundered most towards Fanny herself in her intentions to please. She meant to be giving her little heart a happy flutter, and filling her with sensations of delightful self-consequence; and misinterpreting Fanny's blushes, still thought she must be doing so, when she went to her after the two first dances, and said, with a significant look, "Perhaps you can tell me why my brother goes to town to-morrow? He says he has business there, but will not tell me what. The first time he ever denied me his confidence! But this is what we all come to. All are supplanted sooner or later. Now, I must apply to you for information. Pray, what is Henry going for?"

[60]

Fanny protested her ignorance as steadily as her embarrassment allowed.

"Well, then," replied Miss Crawford laughing, "I must suppose it to be purely for the pleasure of conveying your brother, and of taking of you by the way."

Fanny was confused, but it was the confusion of discontent; while Miss Crawford wondered she did not smile, and thought her over-anxious, or thought her odd, or thought her anything rather than insensible of pleasure in Henry's attentions. Fanny had a good deal of enjoyment in the course of the evening; but Henry's attentions had very little to do with it. She would much rather not have been asked by him again so very soon, and she wished she had not been obliged to suspect that his previous inquiries of Mrs Norris about the supper hour, were all for the sake of securing her at that part of the evening. But it was not to be avoided: he made her feel that she was the object of all; though she could not say that it was unpleasantly done, that there was indelicacy or ostentation in his manner; and sometimes, when he talked of William, he was really not unagreeable, and shewed even a warmth of heart which did him credit. But still his attentions made no part of her satisfaction. She was happy whenever she looked at William, and saw how perfectly he was enjoying himself, in every five minutes that she could walk about with him and hear his account of his partners; she was happy in knowing herself admired; and she was happy in having the two dances with Edmund still to look forward to, during the greatest part of the evening, her hand being so eagerly sought after, that her indefinite engagement with him was in continual perspective. She was happy even when they did take place; but not from any flow of spirits on his side, or any such expressions of tender gallantry as had blessed the morning. His mind was fagged, and her happiness sprung from being the friend with whom it could find repose. "I am worn out with civility," said he. "I have been talking incessantly all night, and with nothing to say. But with you, Fanny, there may be peace. You will not want to be talked to. Let us have the luxury of silence." Fanny would hardly even speak her agreement. A weariness, arising probably, in great measure, from the same feelings which he had acknowledged in the morning, was peculiarly to be respected, and they went down their two dances together with such sober tranquillity as might satisfy any looker-on, that Sir Thomas had been bringing up no wife for his younger son.

[62]

The evening had afforded Edmund little pleasure. Miss Crawford had been in gay spirits when they first danced together, but it was not her gaiety that could do him good; it rather sank than raised his comfort; and afterwards, for he found himself still impelled to seek her again, she had absolutely pained him by her manner of speaking of the profession to which he was now on the point of belonging. They had talked, and they had been silent; he had reasoned, she had ridiculed; and they had parted at last with mutual vexation. Fanny, not able to refrain entirely from observing them, had seen enough to be tolerably satisfied. It was barbarous to be happy when Edmund was suffering. Yet some happiness must and would arise from the very conviction that he did suffer.

When her two dances with him were over, her inclination and strength for more were pretty well at an end; and Sir Thomas, having seen her walk rather than dance down the shortening set, breathless, and with her hand at her side, gave his orders for her sitting down entirely. From that time Mr Crawford sat down likewise.

"Poor Fanny!" cried William, coming for a moment to visit her, and working away his partner's fan as if for life, "how soon she is knocked up! Why, the sport is but just begun. I hope we shall keep it up these two hours. How can you be tired so soon?"

[63]

"So soon! my good friend," said Sir Thomas producing his watch with all necessary caution "it is three o'clock, and your sister is not used to these sort of hours."

"Well, then, Fanny, you shall not get up to morrow before I go. Sleep as long as you can and never mind me."

"Oh! William."

"What! Did she think of being up before you set off?"

"Oh! yes, sir," cried Fanny, rising eagerly from her seat to be nearer her uncle; "I mus get up and breakfast with him. It will be the last time, you know; the last morning."

"You had better not. He is to have break fasted and gone by half-past nine. Mr Craw ford, I think you call for him at half-past nine?"

Fanny was too urgent, however, and had too many tears in her eyes for denial; and it ended in a gracious "Well, well!" which was permission

"Yes, half-past nine," said Crawford to William, as the latter was leaving them, "and I shall be punctual, for there will be no kind sister to get up for me." And in a lower tone to Fanny, "I shall have only a desolate house to hurry from. Your brother will find my ideas of time and his own very different to-morrow."

After a short consideration, Sir Thomas asked Crawford to join the early breakfast party in [64] that house instead of eating alone; he should himself be of it; and the readiness with which his invitation was accepted convinced him that the suspicions whence, he must confess to himself, this very ball had in great measure sprung, were well founded. Mr Crawford was in love with Fanny. He had a pleasing anticipation of what would be. His niece, meanwhile, did not thank him for what he had just done. She had hoped to have William all to herself the last morning. It would have been an unspeakable indulgence. But though her wishes were overthrown, there was no spirit of murmuring within her. On the contrary, she was so totally unused to have her pleasure consulted, or to have anything take place at all in the way she could desire, that she was more disposed to wonder and rejoice in having carried her point so far, than to repine at the counteraction which followed.

Shortly afterward, Sir Thomas was again interfering a little with her inclination, by advising her to go immediately to bed. "Advise" was his word, but it was the advice of absolute power, and she had only to rise, and, with Mr Crawford's very cordial adieus, pass quietly away; stopping at the entrance door, like the Lady of Branxholm Hall, "one moment and no more," to view the happy scene, and take a last look at the five or six determined couple, who were still hard at work; and then, creeping slowly up the principal staircase, pursued by the ceaseless country-dance, feverish with hopes and fears, sour and negus, sore-footed and fatigued, restless and agitated, yet feeling, in spite of everything, that a ball was indeed delightful.

In thus sending her away, Sir Thomas perhaps might not be thinking merely of her health. It might occur to him, that Mr Crawford had been sitting by her long enough, or he might mean to recommend her as a wife by shewing her persuadableness.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE ball was over, and the breakfast was soon over too; the last kiss was given, and William was gone. Mr Crawford had, as he foretold, been very punctual, and short and pleasant had been the meal.

After seeing William to the last moment, Fanny walked back to the breakfast-room with a very saddened heart to grieve over the melancholy change; and there her uncle kindly left her to cry in peace, conceiving, perhaps, that the deserted chair of each young man might exercise her tender enthusiasm, and that the remaining cold pork bones and mustard in William's plate, might but divide her feelings with the broken [66] eggshells in Mr Crawford's. She sat and cried con amore as her uncle intended, but it was con amore fraternal and no other. William was gone, and she now felt as if she had wasted half his visit in idle cares and selfish solicitudes unconnected with him.

Fanny's disposition was such that she could never even think of her aunt Norris in the meagreness and cheerlessness of her own small house, without reproaching herself for some little want of attention to her when they had been last together; much less could her feelings acquit her of having done and said and thought everything by William, that was due to him for a whole fortnight.

It was a heavy, melancholy day. Soon after the second breakfast, Edmund bad them goodbye for a week, and mounted his horse for Peterborough, and then all were gone. Nothing remained of last night but remembrances, which she had nobody to share in. She talked to her aunt Bertram; she must talk to somebody of the ball; but her aunt had seen so little of what had passed, and had so little curiosity, that it was heavy work. Lady Bertram was not certain of anybody's dress or anybody's place at supper, but her own. "She could not recollect what it was that she had heard about one of the Miss Maddoxes, or what it was that Lady Prescott had noticed in Fanny: she was not sure whether Colonel Harrison had been talking of Mr Crawford or of William, when he said he was the finest young man in the room; somebody had whispered something to her; she had forgot to ask Sir Thomas what it could be. And these were her longest speeches and clearest communications: the rest was only a languid "Yes, yes; very well; did you? did he? I did not see that; I should not know one from the other." This was very bad. It was only better than Mrs Norris's sharp answers would have been; but she being gone home with all the supernumerary jellies to nurse a sick maid, there was peace and good humour in their little party, though it could not boast much beside.

[67]

The evening was heavy like the day: "I cannot think what is the matter with me," said Lady Bertram, when the tea-things were removed. "I feel quite stupid. It must be sitting up so late last night. Fanny, you must do something to keep me awake. I cannot work. Fetch the cards; I feel so very stupid."

The cards were brought, and Fanny played at cribbage with her aunt till bedtime; and as Sir Thomas was reading to himself, no sounds were heard in the room for the next two hours beyond the reckonings of the game:—"And that makes thirty-one; four in hand and eight in crib. You are to deal, ma'am; shall I deal for you?" Fanny thought and thought again of the difference which twenty-four hours had made in that room, and all that part of the house. Last night it had been hope and smiles, bustle and motion, noise and brilliancy, in the drawing-room, and out of the drawing-room, and everywhere. Now it was languor, and all but solitude.

[68]

A good night's rest improved her spirits. She could think of William the next day more cheerfully; and as the morning afforded her an opportunity of talking over Thursday night with Mrs Grant and Miss Crawford, in a very handsome style, with all the heightenings of imagination and all the laughs of playfulness which are so essential to the shade of a departed ball, she could afterwards bring her mind without much effort into its everyday state, and easily conform to the tranquillity of the present quiet week.

They were indeed a smaller party than she had ever known there for a whole day together, and he was gone on whom the comfort and cheerfulness of every family meeting and every meal chiefly depended. But this must be learned to be endured. He would soon be always gone; and she was thankful that she could now sit in the same room with her uncle, hear his voice, receive his questions, and even answer them without such wretched feelings as she had formerly known.

"We miss our two young men," was Sir Thomas's observation on both the first and second day, as they formed their very reduced circle after dinner; and in consideration of Fanny's swimming eyes, nothing more was said on the first day than to drink their good health; but on the second it led to something farther. William was kindly commended and his promotion hoped for. "And there is no reason to suppose," added Sir Thomas, "but that his visits to us may now be tolerably frequent. As to Edmund, we must learn to do without him. This will be the last winter of his belonging to us, as he has done."

"Yes," said Lady Bertram, "but I wish he was not going away. They are all going away, I think. I wish they would stay at home."

This wish was levelled principally at Julia, who had just applied for permission to go to town with Maria; and as Sir Thomas thought it best for each daughter that the permission should be granted, Lady Bertram, though in her own good nature she would not have prevented it, was lamenting the change it made in the prospect of Julia's return, which would otherwise have taken place about this time. A great deal of good sense followed on Sir Thomas's side, tending to reconcile his wife to the arrangement. Everything [70] that a considerate parent ought to feel was advanced for her use; and everything that an affectionate mother must feel in promoting her children's enjoyment was attributed to her nature. Lady Bertram agreed to it all with a calm "Yes;" and at the end of a quarter of an hour's silent consideration spontaneously observed, "Sir Thomas, I have been thinking—and I am very glad we took Fanny as we did, for now the others are away we feel the good of it."

Sir Thomas immediately improved this compliment by adding, "Very true. We shew Fanny what a good girl we think her by praising her to her face; she is now a very valuable companion. If we have been kind to her, she is now quite as necessary to us."

"Yes," said Lady Bertram, presently; "and it is a comfort to think that we shall always have her."

Sir Thomas paused, half smiled, glanced at his niece, and then gravely replied, "She will never leave us, I hope, till invited to some other home that may reasonably promise her greater happiness than she knows here."

"And that is not very likely to be, Sir Thomas. Who should invite her? Maria might be very glad to see her at Sotherton now and then, but she would not think of asking her to live there; I cannot do without her."

The week which passed so quietly and peace ably at the great house in Mansfield had a very different character at the Parsonage. To the young lady, at least, in each family, it brough very different feelings. What was tranquillity and comfort to Fanny was tediousness and vexation to Mary. Something arose from difference of disposition and habit: one so easily satisfied, the other so amused to endure; but still more might be imputed to difference of circumstances In some points of interest they were exactly opposed to each other. To Fanny's mind, Edmund's absence was really in its cause and its tendency a relief. To Mary it was every way painful. She felt the want of his society every day, almost every hour, and was too much in want of it to derive anything but irritation from considering the object for which he went. He could not have devised anything more likely to raise his consequence than this week's absence, occurring as it did at the very time of her brother's going away, of William Price's going too, and completing the sort of general break-up of a party which had been so animated. She felt it keenly. They were now a miserable trio, confined within doors by a series of rain and snow, with nothing to do and no variety to hope for. Angry as she was with Edmund for adhering to his own notions, and acting on them in F727 defiance of her (and she had been so angry that they had hardly parted friends at the ball), she could not help thinking of him continually when absent, dwelling on his merit and affection, and longing again for the almost daily meetings they lately had. His absence was unnecessarily long. He should not have planned such an absence: he should not have left home for a week, when her own departure from Mansfield was so near. Then she began to blame herself. She wished she had not spoken so warmly in their last conversation. She was afraid she had used some strong, some contemptuous expressions in speaking of the clergy, and that should not have been. It was ill-bred; it was wrong. She wished such words unsaid with all her heart.

Her vexation did not end with the week. All this was bad, but she had still more to feel when Friday came round again and brought no Edmund; when Saturday came and still no Edmund; and when, through the slight communication with the other family which Sunday produced, she learned that he had actually written home to defer his return, having promised to remain some days longer with his friend.

over, to contend with one disagreeable emotion entirely new to her-jealousy. His friend Mr Owen had sisters; he might find them attractive But at any rate his staying away at a time when according to all preceding plans, she was to remove to London, meant something that she could not bear. Had Henry returned, as he talked of doing, at the end of three or four days, she should now have been leaving Mansfield. It became absolutely necessary for her to get to Fanny and try to learn something more. She could not live any longer in such solitary wretchedness; and she made her way to the Park, through difficulties of walking which she had deemed unconquerable a week before, for the chance of hearing a little in addition, for the sake of at least hearing his name.

The first half hour was lost, for Fanny and Lady Bertram were together, and unless she had Fanny to herself she could hope for nothing. But at last Lady Bertram left the room, and then almost immediately Miss Crawford thus began, with a voice as well regulated as she could:-"And how do you like your cousin Edmund's staying away so long! Being the only young person at home, I consider you as the greatest sufferer. You must miss him. Does his staying longer surprize you?"

"I do not know," said Fanny hesitatingly. "Yes; I had not particularly expected it."

[74]

"Perhaps he will always stay longer than he talks of. It is the general way all young men do."

"He did not, the only time he went to see Mr Owen before."

"He finds the house more agreeable now. He is a very-a very pleasing young man himself, and I cannot help being rather concerned at not seeing him again before I go to London, as will now undoubtedly be the case. I am looking for Henry every day, and as soon as he comes there will be nothing to detain me at Mansfield. I should like to have seen him once more, I confess. But you must give my compliments to him. Yes; I think it must be compliments. Is not there a something wanted, Miss Price, in our language-a something between compliments and-and love-to suit the sort of friendly acquaintance we have had together? So many months' acquaintance! But compliments may be sufficient here. Was his letter a long one? Does he give you much account of what he is doing? Is it Christmas gaieties that he is staying for?"

"I only heard a part of the letter; it was to my uncle; but I believe it was very short; indeed I am sure it was but a few lines. All that I heard was that his friend had pressed him to stay longer, and that he had agreed to do so.

[75]

A few days longer, or some days longer; I an not quite sure which."

"Oh! if he wrote to his father; but I thought it might have been to Lady Bertram or you But if he wrote to his father, no wonder he was concise. Who could write chat to Sir Thomas If he had written to you, there would have been more particulars. You would have heard of balls and parties. He would have sent you a description of everything and everybody. How many Miss Owens are there?"

"Three grown up."

"Are they musical?"

"I do not at all know. I never heard."

"That is the first question, you know," said Miss Crawford, trying to appear gay and unconcerned, "which every woman who plays herself is sure to ask about another. But it is very foolish to ask questions about any young ladiesabout any three sisters just grown up; for one knows, without being told, exactly what they are: all very accomplished and pleasing, and one very pretty. There is a beauty in every family; it is a regular thing. Two play on the piano-forte, and one on the harp; and all sing, or would sing if they were taught, or sing the better for not being taught; or something like it."

"I know nothing of the Miss Owens," said Fanny calmly.

in the s

[76]

"You know nothing and you care less, as people say. Never did tone express indifference plainer. Indeed, how can one care for those one has never seen? Well, when your cousin comes back, he will find Mansfield very quiet; all the noisy ones gone, your brother and mine and myself. I do not like the idea of leaving Mrs Grant now the time draws near. She does not like my going."

Fanny felt obliged to speak. "You cannot doubt your being missed by many,"said she. "You will be very much missed."

Miss Crawford turned her eye on her, as if wanting to hear or see more, and then laughing said, "Oh yes! missed as every noisy evil is missed when it is taken away; that is, there is a great difference felt. But I am not fishing: don't compliment me. If I am missed, it will appear. I may be discovered by those who want to see me. I shall not be in any doubtful, or distant, or unapproachable region."

Now Fanny could not bring herself to speak, and Miss Crawford was disappointed; for she had hoped to hear some pleasant assurance of her power, from one who she thought must know, and her spirits were clouded again.

"The Miss Owens," said she, soon afterwards; "suppose you were to have one of the Miss Owens settled at Thornton Lacey; how should you like it? Stranger things have happened I dare say they are trying for it. And they ar quite in the right, for it would be a very prett establishment for them. I do not at all wonde or blame them. It is everybody's duty to d as well for themselves as they can. Sir Thoma Bertram's son is somebody; and now he is in thei own line. Their father is a clergyman, and thei brother is a clergyman, as they are all clergymen together. He is their lawful property; he fairly belongs to them. You don't speak, Fanny; Mis Price, you don't speak. But honestly now, do not you rather expect it than otherwise?"

"No," said Fanny stoutly, "I do not expec it at all."

"Not at all!" cried Miss Crawford, with alacrity. "I wonder at that. But I dare say you know exactly—I always imagine you are perhaps you do not think him likely to marry a all—or not at present."

"No, I do not," said Fanny softly, hoping she did not err either in the belief or the acknowledg ment of it.

Her companion looked at her keenly; and gathering greater spirit from the blush soon pro duced from such a look, only said, "He is best off as he is," and turned the subject.

CHAPTER XXX.

ISS CRAWFORD'S uneasiness was much lightened by this conversation, and she walked home again in spirits which might have defied almost another week of the same small party in the same bad weather, had they been put to the proof; but as that very evening brought her brother down from London again in quite, or more than quite, his usual cheerfulness, she had nothing further to try her own. His still refusing to tell her what he had gone for was but the promotion of gaiety; a day before it might have irritated, but now it was a pleasant joke; suspected only of concealing something planned as a pleasant surprize to herself. And the next day did bring a surprize to her. Henry had said he should just go and ask the Bertrams how they did, and be back in ten minutes, but he was gone above an hour; and when his sister, who had been waiting for him to walk with her in the garden, met him at last most impatiently in the sweep, and cried out, "My dear Henry, where can you have been all this time?" he had only to say that he had been sitting with Lady Bertram and Fanny.

"Sitting with them an hour and a half!" exclaimed Mary.

But this was only the beginning of her suprize.

"Yes, Mary," said he, drawing her arm with his, and walking along the sweep as if not know ing where he was: "I could not get away soone Fanny looked so lovely! I am quite determined, Mary. My mind is entirely made u Will it astonish you? No: you must be awa that I am quite determined to marry Fann Price."

The surprize was now complete; for, in spi of whatever his consciousness might suggest, suspicion of his having any such views had new entered his sister's imagination; and she looke so truly the astonishment she felt, that he wa obliged to repeat what he had said and mon fully and more solemnly. The conviction of his determination once admitted, it was not un welcome. There was even pleasure with the surprize. Mary was in a state of mind to rejoin in a connection with the Bertram family, and the be not displeased with her brother's marrying little beneath him.

"Yes, Mary," was Henry's concluding assurance. "I am fairly caught. You know with what idle designs I began; but this is the end of them. I have (I flatter myself) made no in considerable progress in her affections; but my own are entirely fixed."

[80]

"Lucky, lucky girl!" cried Mary, as soon as she could speak; "what a match for her! My dearest Henry, this must be my first feeling; but my second, which you shall have as sincerely, is, that I approve your choice from my soul, and foresee your happiness as heartily as I wish and desire it. You will have a sweet little wife; all gratitude and devotion. Exactly what you deserve. What an amazing match for her! Mrs Norris often talks of her luck; what will she say now? The delight of all the family, indeed! And she has some true friends in it! How they will rejoice! But tell me all about it! Talk to me for ever. When did you begin to think seriously about her?"

Nothing could be more impossible than to answer such a question, though nothing could be more agreeable than to have it asked. "How the pleasing plague had stolen on him" he could not say; and before he had expressed the same sentiment with a little variation of words three times over, his sister eagerly interrupted him with "Ah, my dear Henry, and this is what took you to London! This was your business! You chose to consult the Admiral before you made up your mind."

But this he stoutly denied. He knew his uncle too well to consult him on any matrimonial scheme. The Admiral hated marriage, and thought it never pardonable in a young man of independent fortune.

"When Fanny is known to him," continue Henry, "he will doat on her. She is exact the woman to do away every prejudice of suc a man as the Admiral, for she is exactly such woman as he thinks does not exist in the work She is the very impossibility he would describ if indeed he has now delicacy of language enoug to embody his own ideas. But till it is absoluted settled—settled beyond all interference, he sha know nothing of the matter. No, Mary, you ar quite mistaken. You have not discovered m business yet."

"Well, well, I am satisfied. I know now t whom it must relate, and am in no hurry for the rest. Fanny Price! wonderful, quite wonderful That Mansfield should have done so much forthat you should have found your fate in Mansfield! But you are quite right; you could not hav chosen better. There is not a better girl in the world, and you do not want for fortune; and a to her connections, they are more than good The Bertrams are undoubtedly some of the firs people in this country. She is niece to Sin Thomas Bertram; that will be enough for the world. But go on, go on. Tell me more What are your plans? Does she know her own happiness?"

[82]

"No."

"What are you waiting for?"

"For—for very little more than opportunity. Mary, she is not like her cousins; but I think I shall not ask in vain."

"Oh no! you cannot. Were you even less pleasing—supposing her not to love you already (of which, however, I can have little doubt) you would be safe. The gentleness and gratitude of her disposition would secure her all your own immediately. From my soul I do not think she would marry you without love; that is, if there is a girl in the world capable of being uninfluenced by ambition, I can suppose it her; but ask her to love you, and she will never have the heart to refuse."

As soon as her eagerness could rest in silence, he was as happy to tell as she could be to listen; and a conversation followed almost as deeply interesting to her as to himself, though he had in fact nothing to relate but Fanny's charms. Fanny's beauty of face and figure, Fanny's graces of manner and goodness of heart, were the exhaustless theme. The gentleness, modesty, and sweetness of her character were warmly expatiated on; that sweetness which makes so essential a part of every woman's worth in the judgment of man, that though he sometimes loves where it is not, he can never believe it absent.

[83]

Her temper he had good reason to depend of and to praise. He had often seen it tried. W there one of the family, excepting Edmun who had not in some way or other continual exercised her patience and forbearance? He affections were evidently strong. To see he with her brother! What could more delightfull prove that the warmth of her heart was equa to its gentleness? What could be more encour aging to a man who had her love in view? Ther her understanding was beyond every suspicion quick and clear: and her manners were the mirro of her own modest and elegant mind. Nor wa this all. Henry Crawford had too much sense not to feel the worth of good principles in a wife though he was too little accustomed to serious reflection to know them by [their] proper name but when he talked of her having such a steadiness and regularity of conduct, such a high notion of honour, and such an observance of decorum as might warrant any man in the fullest dependence on her faith and integrity, he expressed what was inspired by the knowledge of her being well principled and religious.

"I could so wholly and absolutely confide in her," said he, "and that is what I want."

Well might his sister, believing as she really did that his opinion of Fanny Price was scarcely beyond her merits, rejoice in her prospects.

[84]

"The more I think of it," she cried, "the more am I convinced that you are doing quite right; and though I should never have selected Fanny Price as the girl most likely to attach you, I am now persuaded she is the very one to make you happy. Your wicked project upon her peace turns out a clever thought indeed. You will both find your good in it."

"It was bad, very bad in me against such a creature; but I did not know her then; and she shall have no reason to lament the hour that first put it into my head. I will make her very happy, Mary; happier than she has ever yet been herself, or ever seen anybody else. I will not take her from Northamptonshire. I shall let Everingham, and rent a place in this neighbourhood; perhaps Stanwix Lodge. I shall let a seven years' lease of Everingham. I am sure of an excellent tenant at half a word. I could name three people now, who would give me my own terms and thank me."

"Ha!" cried Mary; "settle in Northamptonshire! That is pleasant! Then we shall be all together."

When she had spoken it, she recollected herself, and wished it unsaid; but there was no need of confusion; for her brother saw her only as the supposed inmate of Mansfield Parsonage, and replied but to invite her in the kindest manner to his own house, and to claim the best right in her.

[85]

"You must give us more than half your time," said he. "I cannot admit Mrs Grant to have an equal claim with Fanny and myself, for we shall both have a right in you. Fanny will be so truly your sister!"

Mary had only to be grateful and give general assurances; but she was now very fully purposed to be the guest of neither brother nor sister many months longer.

"You will divide your year between London and Northamptonshire?"

"Yes."

"That's right; and in London, of course, a house of your own; no longer with the Admiral. My dearest Henry, the advantage to you of getting away from the Admiral before your manners are hurt by the contagion of his, before you have contracted any of his foolish opinions, or learn to sit over your dinner, as if it were the best blessing of life! You are not sensible of the gain, for your regard for him has blinded you; but, in my estimation, your marrying early may be the saving of you. To have seen you grow like the Admiral in word or deed, look or gesture, would have broken my heart."

"Well, well, we do not think quite alike here. The Admiral has his faults, but he is a very good [86] man, and has been more than a father to me. Few fathers would have let me have my own way half so much. You must not prejudice Fanny against him. I must have them love one another."

Mary refrained from saying what she felt, that there could not be two persons in existence whose characters and manners were less accordant: time would discover it to him; but she could not help this reflection on the Admiral. "Henry, I think so highly of Fanny Price that if I could suppose the next Mrs Crawford would have half the reason which my poor ill-used aunt had to abhor the very name, I would prevent the marriage, if possible; but I know you: I know that a wife you loved would be the happiest of women, and that even when you ceased to love, she would yet find in you the liberality and good-breeding of a gentleman."

The impossibility of not doing everything in the world to make Fanny Price happy, or ceasing to love Fanny Price, was of course the groundwork of his eloquent answer.

"Had you seen her this morning, Mary," he continued, "attending with such ineffable sweetness and patience to all the demands of her aunt's stupidity, working with her, and for her, her colour beautifully heightened as she leant over the work, then returning to her seat to finish a note which she was previously engaged in w ing for that stupid woman's service, and all t with such unpretending gentleness, so much if it were a matter of course that she was not have a moment at her own command, her h arranged as neatly as it always is, and one lit curl falling forward as she wrote, which she n and then shook back, and in the midst of all th still speaking at intervals to me, or listening, a as if she liked to listen, to what I said. Had y seen her so, Mary, you would not have impl the possibility of her power over my heart exceasing."

[87]

"My dearest Henry," cried Mary, stoppi short, and smiling in his face, "how glad I am see you so much in love! It quite delights n But what will Mrs Rushworth and Julia say?"

"I care neither what they say nor what the feel. They will now see what sort of wom it is that can attach me, that can attach a mo of sense. I wish the discovery may do them a good. And they will now see their cousin treat as she ought to be, and I wish they may heartily ashamed of their own abominable negled and unkindness. They will be angry," he added after a moment's silence, and in a cooler tom "Mrs Rushworth will be very angry. It we be a bitter pill to her; that is, like other bitt pills, it will have two moments' ill flavour, an [88]

Then returning to her seat to finish a note which she was previously engaged in writing for that stupid woman's service then be swallowed and forgotten; for I am not such a coxcomb as to suppose her feelings more asting than other women's, though I was the object of them. Yes, Mary, my Fanny will feel a difference, indeed; a daily, hourly difference, in the behaviour of every being who approaches her; and it will be the completion of my happiness to know that I am the doer of it, that I am the person to give the consequence so justly her due. Now she is dependent, helpless, friendless, neglected, forgotten."

"Nay, Henry, not by all; not forgotten by all; not friendless or forgotten. Her cousin Edmund never forgets her."

"Edmund! True, I believe he is (generally speaking), kind to her, and so is Sir Thomas in his way; but it is the way of a rich, superior, longworded, arbitrary uncle. What can Sir Thomas and Edmund together do, what do they do for her happiness, comfort, honour, and dignity in the world, to what I shall do?"

CHAPTER XXXI.

H ENRY CRAWFORD was at Mansfield Park again the next morning, and at an earlier hour than common visiting warrants. The two ladies were together in the breakfast-room, and, fortunately for him, Lady [89]

Bertram was on the very point of quitting it a he entered. She was almost at the door, and no chusing by any means to take so much trouble in vain, she still went on, after a civil reception a short sentence about being waited for, and a "Let Sir Thomas know," to the servant.

Henry, overjoyed to have her go, bowed and watched her off, and without losing another mo ment, turned instantly to Fanny, and, taking out some letters, said, with a most animated look "I must acknowledge myself infinitely obliged to any creature who gives me such an opportunity of seeing you alone: I have been wishing it more than you can have any idea. Knowing as I do what your feelings as a sister are, I could hardly have borne that any one in the house should share with you in the first knowledge of the news ] now bring. He is made. Your brother is a lieutenant. I have the infinite satisfaction of congratulating you on your brother's promotion Here are the letters which announce it, this moment come to hand. You will, perhaps, like to see them."

Fanny could not speak, but he did not want her to speak. To see the expression of her eyes, the change of her complexion, the progress of her feelings, their doubt, confusion, and felicity was enough. She took the letters as he gave them. The first was from the Admiral to inform is nephew, in a few words, of his having suceeded in the object he had undertaken, the pronotion of young Price, and enclosing two more, one from the Secretary of the First Lord to a driend, whom the Admiral had set to work in he business; the other from a friend to himself, by which it appeared that his lordship had the ery great happiness of attending to the recomnendation of Sir Charles; that Sir Charles was much delighted in having such an opportunity of proving his regard for Admiral Crawford, and hat the circumstance of Mr William Price's commission as Second Lieutenant of H.M. Sloop Thrush," being made out, was spreading general oy through a wide circle of great people.

[90]

While her hand was trembling under these etters, her eye runing from one to the other, nd her heart swelling with emotion, Crawford hus continued, with unfeigned eagerness, to exress his interest in the event:—

"I will not talk of my own happiness," said he, great as it is, for I think only of yours. Comared with you, who has a right to be happy? I ave almost grudged myself my own prior knowldge of what you ought to have known before Il the world. I have not lost a moment, howver. The post was late this morning, but there as not been since a moment's delay. How imatient, how anxious, how wild I have been on the subject, I will not attempt to describe; how severely mortified, how cruelly disappointed, i not having it finished while I was in London I was kept there from day to day in the hope o it, for nothing less dear to me than such an ob ject would have detained me half the time from Mansfield. But though my uncle entered int my wishes with all the warmth I could desire and exerted himself immediately, there were dif ficulties from the absence of one friend, and th engagements of another, which at last I could no longer bear to stay the end of, and knowing in what good hands I left the cause, I came awa on Monday, trusting that many posts would no pass before I should be followed by such ver letters as these. My uncle, who is the very bes man in the world, has exerted himself, as I knew he would, after seeing your brother. He wa delighted with him. I would not allow mysel yesterday to say how delighted, or to repeat hal that the Admiral said in his praise. I deferred it all till his praise should be proved the prais of a friend, as this day does prove it. Now may say that even I could not require William Price to excite a greater interest, or be followed by warmer wishes and higher commendation than were most voluntarily bestowed by my un cle after the evening they had passed together. "Has this been all your doing, then?" cried

[91]

[92]

Fanny. "Good heaven! how very, very kind! Have you really—was it by your desire? I beg your pardon, but I am bewildered. Did Adniral Crawford apply? How was it? I am stupefied."

Henry was most happy to make it more inelligible, by beginning at an earlier stage, and explaining very particularly what he had done. His last journey to London had been undertaken with no other view than that of introducing her prother in Hill Street, and prevailing on the Adniral to exert whatever interest he might have for getting him on. This had been his business. He had communicated it to no creature; he had not breathed a syllable of it even to Mary; while incertain of the issue, he could not have borne my participation of his feelings, but this had been his business; and he spoke with such a glow of what his solicitude had been, and used such trong expressions, was so abounding in the deepst interest, in twofold motives, in views and vishes more than could be told, that Fanny could ot have remained insensible of his drift, had she een able to attend; but her heart was so full nd her senses still so astonished, that she could sten but imperfectly even to what he told her f William, and saying only when he paused, How kind! how very kind! Oh, Mr Crawford, re are infinitely obliged to you! Dearest, dearest William!" She jumped up and moved haste towards the door, crying out, "I will go my uncle. My uncle ought to know it as so as possible." But this could not be suffered The opportunity was too fair, and feelings t impatient. He was after her immediated "She must not go, she must allow him five mi utes longer," and he took her hand and led h back to her seat, and was in the middle of l further explanation, before she had suspect for what she was detained. When she did u derstand it, however, and found herself expected to believe that she had created sensations whi his heart had never known before, and that ever thing he had done for William was to be place to the account of his excessive and unequalle attachment to her, she was exceedingly distresse and for some moments unable to speak. S considered it all as nonsense, as mere trifling an gallantry, which meant only to deceive for the hour; she could not but feel that it was treating her improperly and unworthily, and in such way as she had not deserved; but it was like him self, and entirely of a piece with what she has seen before; and she would not allow herself show half the displeasure she felt, because l had been conferring an obligation, which no was of delicacy on his part could make a trifle to he While her heart was still bounding with joy an [94] gratitude on William's behalf, she could not be severely resentful of anything that injured only nerself; and after having twice drawn back her and, she got up, and said only, with much agitation, "Don't, Mr Crawford, pray don't! I beg you would not. This is a sort of talking which s very unpleasant to me. I must go away. I cannot bear it." But he was still talking on, describing his affection, soliciting a return, and, inally, in words so plain as to bear but one meanng even to her, offering himself, hand, fortune, everything to her acceptance. It was so; he had said it. Her astonishment and confusion increased; and though still not knowing how to suppose him serious, she could hardly stand. He pressed for an answer.

[93]

"No, no, no!" she cried, hiding her face. "This is all nonsense. Do not distress me. I can hear no more of this. Your kindness to William makes me more obliged to you than words can express; but I do not want, I cannot bear, I must not listen to such—No, no, don't hink of me. But you are not thinking of me. I know it is all nothing."

She had burst away from him, and at that moment Sir Thomas was heard speaking to a ervant in his way towards the room they were n. It was no time for further assurances or intreaty, though to part with her at a moment when her modesty alone seemed, to his sanguine and pre-assured mind, to stand in the way of the happiness he sought, was cruel necessity. She rushed out at an opposite door from the one her uncle was approaching, and was walking up and down the East room in the utmost confusion of contrary feeling, before Sir Thomas's politeness or apologies were over, or he had reached the beginning of the joyful intelligence which his visitor came to communicate.

[95]

She was feeling, thinking, trembling, about everything; agitated, happy, miserable, infinitely obliged, absolutely angry. It was all beyond belief! He was inexcusable, incomprehensible? But such were his habits, that he could do nothing without a mixture of evil. He had previously made her the happiest of human beings, and now he had insulted—she knew not what to say—how to class, or how to regret it. She would not have him be serious, and yet what could excuse the use of such words and offers, if they meant but to trifle?

But William was a lieutenant. That was a fact beyond a doubt, and without an alloy. She would think of it for ever and forget all the rest. Mr Crawford would certainly never address her so again; he must have seen how unwelcome it was to her; and in that case, how gratefully she could esteem him for his friendship to William!

[96]

She would not stir farther from the East room an the head of the great staircase, till she had tisfied herself of Mr Crawford's having left e house; but when convinced of his being gone, e was eager to go down and be with her uncle, nd have all the happiness of his information his conjectures as to what would now be Villiam's destination. Sir Thomas was as joy-I as she could desire, and very kind and comunicative; and she had so comfortable a talk ith him about William as to make her feel as nothing had occurred to vex her, till she found, wards the close, that Mr Crawford was enaged to return and dine there that very day. his was a most unwelcome hearing, for though might think nothing of what had passed, it ould be quite distressing to her to see him again soon.

She tried to get the better of it; tried very ard, as the dinner hour was approached, to feel ad appear as usual; but it was quite impossible or her not to look most shy and uncomfortable hen their visitor entered the room. She could ot have supposed it in the power of any conrrence of circumstances to give her so many unful sensations on the first day of hearing of Villiam's promotion.

Mr Crawford was not only in the room—he as soon close to her. He had a note to deliver from his sister. Fanny could not look at him but there was no consciousness of past folly in his voice. She opened her note immediately glad to have anything to do, and happy, as sh read it, to feel that the fidgettings of her aun Norris, who was also to dine there, screened he a little from view.

[97]

"MY DEAR FANNY—for so I may now alway call you, to the infinite relief of a tongue that ha been stumbling at Miss Price for at least the las six weeks: I cannot let my brother go withou sending you a few lines of general congratula tion, and giving my most joyful consent and approval. Go on, my dear Fanny, and withou fear; there can be no difficulties worth naming I chuse to suppose that the assurance of my con sent will be something; so you may smile upon him with your sweetest smiles this afternoon and send him back to me even happier than h goes.—Yours affectionately,

"M. C."

These were not expressions to do Fanny any good; for though she read in too much haste and confusion to form the clearest judgment of Mis Crawford's meaning, it was evident that sh meant to compliment her on her brother's attach ment, and even to appear to believe it serious [98]

She did not know what to do, or what to think. There was wretchedness in the idea of its being erious; there was perplexity and agitation every vay. She was distressed whenever Mr Crawford spoke to her, and he spoke to her much too often; and she was afraid there was a something n his voice and manner in addressing her very lifferent from what they were when he talked to the others. Her comfort in that day's dinner was quite destroyed: she could hardly eat anyhing; and when Sir Thomas good-humouredly observed, that joy had taken away her appetite, she was ready to sink with shame, from the dread of Mr Crawford's interpretation; for though nothing could have tempted her to turn her eyes to the right hand, where he sat, she felt that his were immediately directed towards her.

She was more silent than ever. She would hardly join even when William was the subject, for his commission came ail from the right hand too, and there was pain in the connection.

She thought Lady Bertram sat longer than ever, and began to be in despair of ever getting away; but at last they were in the drawing-room, and she was able to think as she would, while her aunts finished the subject of William's appointment in their own style.

Mrs Norris seemed as much delighted with the saving it would be to Sir Thomas as with any part of it. "Now William would be able to keep himself, which would make a vast difference to his uncle, for it was unknown how much he had cost his uncle; and, indeed, it would make some difference in her presents too. She was very glad that she had given William what she did at parting, very glad, indeed, that it had been in her power, without material inconvenience, just at that time to give him something rather considerable; that is for her, with her limited means, for now it would all be useful in helping to fit up his cabin. She knew he must be at some expense, that he would have many things to buy, though to be sure his father and mother would be able to put him in the way of getting everything very cheap; but she was very glad she had contributed her mite towards it."

[99]

"I am glad you gave him something considerable," said Lady Bertram, with [most] unsuspicious calmness, "for I gave him only £10."

"Indeed!" cried Mrs Norris, reddening. "Upon my word, he must have gone off with his pockets well lined, and at no expense for his journey to London either!"

"Sir Thomas told me £10 would be enough."

Mrs Norris being not at all inclined to question its sufficiency began to take the matter in another point.

"It is amazing," said she, "how much young [100] people cost their friends, what with bringing them up and putting them out in the world! They little think how much it comes to, or what their parents, or their uncles and aunts, pay for them in the course of the year. Now, here are my sister Price's children; take them all together, I dare say nobody would believe what a sum they cost Sir Thomas every year, to say nothing of what I do for them."

"Very true, sister, as you say. But, poor things! they cannot help it; and you know it makes very little difference to Sir Thomas. Fanny, William must not forget my shawl, if he goes to the East Indies; and I shall give him a commission for anything else that is worth having. I wish he may go to the East Indies, that I may have my shawl. I think I will have two shawls, Fanny."

Fanny, meanwhile, speaking only when she could not help it, was very earnestly trying to understand what Mr and Miss Crawford were at. There was everything in the world against their being serious, but his words and manner. Everything natural, probable, reasonable, was against it; all their habits and ways of thinking, and all her own demerits. How could she have excited serious attachment in a man who had seen so many, and been admired by so many, and flirted with so many, infinitely her superiors; who seemed so little open to serious impressions, even where pains had been taken to please him; who thought so slightly, so carelessly, so unfeelingly on all such points; who was everything to everybody, and seemed to find no one essential to him? And further, how could it be supposed that his sister, with all her high and worldly notions of matrimony, would be forwarding anything of a serious nature in such a quarter? Nothing could be more unnatural in either. Fanny was ashamed of her own doubts. Everything might be possible rather than serious attachment, or serious approbation of it toward her. She had quite convinced herself of this before Sir Thomas and Mr Crawford joined them. The difficulty was in maintaining the conviction quite so absolutely after Mr Crawford was in the room; for once or twice a look seemed forced on her which she did not know how to class among the common meaning; in any other man, at least, she would have said that it meant something very earnest, very pointed. But she still tried to believe it no more than what he might often have expressed towards her cousins and fifty other women.

[101]

She thought he was wishing to speak to her unheard by the rest. She fancied he was trying for it the whole evening at intervals, whenever Sir Thomas was out of the room, or at all en-[102] gaged with Mrs Norris, and she carefully refused him every opportunity.

At last—it seemed an at last to Fanny's nervousness, though not remarkably late—he began to talk of going away; but the comfort of the sound was impaired by his turning to her the next moment, and saying, "Have you nothing to send to Mary? No answer to her note? She will be disappointed if she receives nothing from you. Pray write to her, if it be only a line."

"Oh yes! certainly," cried Fanny, rising in haste, the haste of embarrassment and of wanting to get away—"I will write directly."

She went accordingly to the table, where she was in the habit of writing for her aunt, and prepared her materials without knowing what in the world to say. She had read Miss Crawford's note only once, and how to reply to anything so imperfectly understood was most distressing. Quite unpractised in such sort of notewriting, had there been time for scruples and fears as to style she would have felt them in abundance: but something must be instantly written; and with only one decided feeling, that of wishing not to appear to think anything really intended, she wrote thus, in great trembling both of spirits and hand:—

"I am very much obliged to you, my dear Miss Crawford, for your kind congratulations, as far as they relate to my dearest William. The rest of your note I know means nothing; but I am so unequal to anything of the sort, that I hope you will excuse my begging you to take no further notice. I have seen too much of Mr Crawford not to understand his manners; if he understood me well, he would, I dare say, behave differently. I do not know what I write, but it would be a great favour of you never to mention the subject again. With thanks for the honour of your note, I remain, dear Miss Crawford, &c., &c."

[103]

The conclusion was scarcely intelligible from increasing fright, for she found that Mr Crawford, under pretence of receiving the note, was coming towards her.

"You cannot think I mean to hurry you," said he, in an under voice, perceiving the amazing trepidation with which she made up the note; "you cannot think I have any such object. Do not hurry yourself, I entreat."

"Oh! I thank you; I have quite done, just done; it will be ready in a moment; I am very much obliged to you; if you will be so good as to give that to Miss Crawford."

The note was held out, and must be taken; and as she instantly and with averted eyes walked towards the fire-place, where sat the others, he had nothing to do but go in good earnest.

[104]

Fanny thought she had never known a day of greater agitation, both of pain and pleasure; but happily, the pleasure was not of a sort to die with the day; for every day would restore the mowledge of William's advancement, whereas he pain, she hoped, would return no more. She had no doubt that her note must appear exsessively ill-written, that the language would disgrace a child, for her distress had allowed no arcangement; but at least it would assure them both of her being neither imposed on nor gratified by Mr Crawford's attentions.

CHAPTER XXXII.

FANNY had by no means forgotten Mr Crawford when she awoke the next morning; but she remembered the purport of her note, and was not less sanguine as to its efcect than she had been the night before. If Mr Crawford would but go away! That was what the most earnestly desired; go and take his sister with him, as he was to do, and as he returned to Mansfield on purpose to do. And why it was not done already she could not devise, for Miss Crawford certainly wanted no delay. Fanny had hoped, in the course of his yesterday's visit, to hear the day named; but he had only spoken of their journey as what would take place ere long.

[105]

Having so satisfactorily settled the conviction her note would convey, she could not but be astonished to see Mr Crawford, as she accidentally did, coming up to the house again, and at an hour as early as the day before. His coming might have nothing to do with her, but she must avoid seeing him if possible; and being then on her way upstairs, she resolved there to remain, during the whole of his visit, unless actually sent for; and as Mrs Norris was still in the house, there seemed little danger of her being wanted.

She sat some time in a good deal of agitation, listening, trembling, and fearing to be sent for every moment; but as no footsteps approached the East room, she grew gradually composed, could sit down, and be able to employ herself, and able to hope that Mr Crawford had come and would go without her being obliged to know anything of the matter.

Nearly half an hour had passed, and she was growing very comfortable, when suddenly the sound of a step in regular approach was heard; a heavy step, an unusual step in that part of the house; it was her uncle's; she knew it as well as his voice; she had trembled at it as often, and [106] began to tremble again, at the idea of his coming up to speak to her, whatever might be the subject. It was indeed Sir Thomas, who opened the door and asked if she were there, and if he might come n. The terror of his former occasional visits to that room seemed all renewed, and she felt as if he were going to examine her again in French and English.

She was all attention, however, in placing a chair for him, and trying to appear honoured; and in her agitation, had quite overlooked the deficiencies of her apartment, till he, stopping short as he entered, said, with much surprise, 'Why have you no fire to-day?"

There was snow on the ground, and she was sitting in a shawl. She hesitated.

"I am not cold, sir: I never sit here long at this time of year."

"But you have a fire in general?"

"No, sir."

"How comes this about? Here must be some mistake. I understood that you had the use of this room by way of making you perfectly comfortable. In your bedchamber I know you cannot have a fire. Here is some great misapprenension which must be rectified. It is highly unfit for you to sit, be it only half an hour a day, without a fire. You are not strong. You are chilly. Your aunt cannot be aware of this."

[107]

Fanny would rather have been silent; but being obliged to speak, she could not forbear, in justice to the aunt she loved best, from saying something in which the words "my aunt Norris" were distinguishable.

"I understand," cried her uncle, recollecting himself, and not wanting to hear more: "I understand. Your aunt Norris has always been an advocate, and very judiciously, for young people's being brought up without unnecessary indulgences; but there should be moderation in everything. She is also very hardy herself, which of course will influence her in her opinion of the wants of others. And on another account, too, I can perfectly comprehend. I know what her sentiments have always been. The principle was good in itself, but it may have been, and I believe has been, carried too far in your case. I am aware that there has been sometimes, in some points, a misplaced distinction; but I think too well of you, Fanny, to suppose you will ever harbour resentment on that account. You have an understanding which will prevent you from receiving things only in part, and judging partially by the event. You will take in the whole of the past, you will consider times, persons, and probabilities, and you will feel that they were not least your friends who were educating and preparing you for that mediocrity of con-[108] dition which seemed to be your lot. Though their caution may prove eventually unnecessary, it was kindly meant; and of this you may be assured, that every advantage of affluence will be doubled by the little privations and restrictions that may have been imposed. I am sure you will not disappoint my opinion of you, by failing at any time to treat your aunt Norris with respect and attention that are due to her. But enough of this. Sit down, my dear. I must speak to you for a few minutes, but I will not detain you long."

Fanny obeyed, with eyes cast down and colour rising. After a moment's pause, Sir Thomas, trying to suppress a smile, went on.

"You are not aware, perhaps, that I have had a visitor this morning. I had not been long in my own room, after breakfast, when Mr Crawford was shewn in. His errand you may probably conjecture."

Fanny's colour grew deeper and deeper; and her uncle, perceiving that she was embarrassed to a degree that made either speaking or looking up quite impossible, turned away his own eyes, and without any farther pause proceeded in his account of Mr Crawford's visit.

Mr Crawford's business had been to declare himself the lover of Fanny, make decided proposals for her, and entreat the sanction of the uncle, who seemed to stand in the place of her parents; and he had done it all so well, so openly, so liberally, so properly, that Sir Thomas, feeling, moreover, his own replies, and his own remarks to have been very much to the purpose, was exceedingly happy to give the particulars of their conversation, and, little aware of what was passing in his niece's mind, conceived, that by such details he must be gratifying her far more than himself. He talked, therefore, for several minutes without Fanny's daring to interrupt him. She had hardly even attained the wish to do it. Her mind was in too much confusion. She had changed her position; and, with her eyes fixed intently on one of the windows, was listening to her uncle in the utmost perturbation and dismay. For a moment he ceased, but she had barely become conscious of it, when, rising from his chair, he said, "and now, Fanny, having performed one part of my commission, and shewn you everything placed on a basis the most assured and satisfactory, I may execute the remainder by prevailing on you to accompany me downstairs, where, though I cannot but presume on having been no unacceptable companion myself, I must submit to your finding one still better worth listening to. Mr Crawford, as you have perhaps foreseen, is yet in the house. He is in my room, and hoping to see you there."

· · · ·

[109]

[110]

There was a look, a start, an exclamation, on hearing this, which astonished Sir Thomas; but what was his increase of astonishment on hearing her exclaim—"Oh! no, sir, I cannot, indeed I cannot go down to him. Mr Crawford ought to know—he must know that; I told him enough yesterday to convince him; he spoke to me on this subject yesterday, and I told him without disguise that it was very disagreeable to me, and quite out of my power to return his good opinion."

"I do not catch your meaning," said Sir Thomas, sitting down again. "Out of your power to return his good opinion? What is all this? I know he spoke to you yesterday, and (as far as I understand) received as much encouragement to proceed as a well-judging young woman could permit herself to give. I was very much pleased with what I collected to have been your behaviour on the occasion; it shewed a discretion highly to be commended. But now, when he has made his overtures so properly, and honourably—what are your scruples now?"

"You are mistaken, sir," cried Fanny, forced by the anxiety of the moment even to tell her uncle that he was wrong; "you are quite mistaken. How could Mr Crawford say such a thing? I gave him no encouragement yesterday. On the contrary, I told him, I cannot recollect my exact words, but I am sure I told him that I would not listen to him, that it was very unpleasant to me in every respect, and that I begged him never to talk to me in that manner again. I am sure I said as much as that and more; and I should have said still more, if I had been quite certain of his meaning anything seriously; but I did not like to be, I could not bear to be, imputing more than might be intended. I thought it might all pass for nothing with him."

12

[111]

She could say no more; her breath was almost gone.

"Am I to understand," said Sir Thomas, after a few moments' silence, "that you mean to refuse Mr Crawford?

"Yes, sir."

"Refuse him?"

"Yes, sir."

"Refuse Mr Crawford! Upon what plea? For what reason?"

"I-I cannot like him, sir, well enough to marry him."

"This is very strange!" said Sir Thomas, in a voice of calm displeasure. "There is something in this which my comprehension does not reach. Here is a young man wishing to pay his addresses to you, with everything to recommend him; not merely situation in life, fortune, and character, but with more than common agreeable-ness, with address and conversation pleasing to everybody. And he is not an acquaintance of to-day; you have now known him some time. His sister, moreover, is your intimate friend, and he has been doing that for your brother, which I should suppose would have been almost sufficient recommendation to you, had there been no other. It is very uncertain when my interest might have got William on. He has done it already."

[112]

"Yes," said Fanny, in a faint voice, and looking down with fresh shame; and she did feel almost ashamed of herself, after such a picture as her uncle had drawn, for not liking Mr Crawford.

"You must have been aware," continued Sir Thomas presently, "you must have been some time aware of a particularity in Mr Crawford's manners to you. This cannot have taken you by surprise. You must have observed his attentions; and though you always received them very properly (I have no accusation to make on that head), I never perceived them to be unpleasant to you. I am half inclined to think, Fanny, that you do not quite know your own feelings."

"Oh yes, sir! indeed I do. His attentions were always-what I did not like."

Sir Thomas looked at her with deeper surprise. "This is beyond me," said he. "This re-

[113]

He paused and eyed her fixedly. He saw her lips formed into a no, though the sound was inarticulate, but her face was like scarlet. That, however, in so modest a girl might be very compatible with innocence; and chusing at least to appear satisfied, he quickly added, "No, no, I know that is quite out of the question; quite impossible. Well, there is nothing more to be said."

And for a few minutes he did say nothing. He was deep in thought. His niece was deep in thought likewise, trying to harden and prepare herself against farther questioning. She would rather die than own the truth; and she hoped by a little reflection to fortify herself beyond betraying it.

"Independently of the interest which Mr Crawford's choice seemed to justify," said Sir Thomas, beginning again, and very composedly, "his wishing to marry at all so early is recommendatory to me. I am an advocate for early marriages, where there are means in proportion, and would have every young man, with a sufficient income, settled as soon after four-and-twenty as he can. This is so much my opinion, that I am sorry to think how little likely my own eldest son, your cousin, Mr Bertram, is to marry early; but at present, as far as I can judge, matrimony makes no part of his plans or thoughts. I wish he were more likely to fix." Here was a glance at Fanny. "Edmund, I consider, from his disconsistions and habits, as much more likely to marry early than his brother. He, indeed, I have lately thought has seen the woman he could nove, which, I am convinced, my eldest son has hot. Am I right? Do you agree with me, my dear?"

[114]

"Yes, sir."

It was gently, but it was calmly said, and Sir Thomas was easy on the score of the cousins. But the removal of his alarm did his niece no service; as her unaccountableness was confirmed his displeasure increased; and getting up and walking about the room, with a frown, which Fanny could picture to herself, though she dared not lift up her eyes, he shortly afterwards, and in a voice of authority, said, "Have you any reason, child, to think ill of Mr Crawford's temper?" "No, sir."

She longed to add, "but of his principles I nave;" but her heart sunk under the appalling prospect of discussion, explanation, and probably non-conviction. Her ill opinion of him was founded chiefly on observations, which, for her cousins' sake, she could scarcely dare mention to their father. Maria and Julia, and especially Maria, were so closely implicated in Mr Crawford's misconduct, that she could not give his character, such as she believed it, without betraying them. She had hoped that, to a man like her uncle, so discerning, so honourable, so good, the simple acknowledgment of settled dislike on her side, would have been sufficient. To her infinite grief she found it was not.

[115]

Sir Thomas came towards the table where she sat in trembling wretchedness, and with a good deal of cold sternness, said, "It is of no use, I perceive, to talk to you. We had better put an end to this most mortifying conference. Mr Crawford must not be kept longer waiting. I will, therefore, only add, as thinking it my duty to mark my opinion of your conduct, that you have disappointed every expectation I had formed, and proved yourself of a character the very reverse of what I had supposed. For I had, Fanny, as I think my behaviour must have shewn, formed a very favourable opinion of you from the period of my return from England. I had thought you peculiarly free from wilfulness of temper, self-conceit, and every tendency to that independence of spirit which prevails so much in modern days, even in young women, and which in young women is offensive and disgusting beyond all common offence. But you have now hewn me that you can be wilful and perverse; hat you can and will decide for yourself, withut any consideration or deference for those who ave surely some right to guide you, without ven asking their advice. You have shewn yourelf very, very different from anything that I ad imagined. The advantage or disadvantage f your family, of your parents, your brothers nd sisters, never seems to have had a moment's hare in your thoughts on this occasion. How hey might be benefited, how they must rejoice n such an establishment for you, is nothing to you. You think only of yourself, and because you do not feel for Mr Crawford exactly what a young heated fancy imagines to be necessary for nappiness, you resolve to refuse him at once, vithout wishing even for a little time to consider of it, a little more time for cool consideration, and for really examining your own inclinations; and are, in a wild fit of folly, throwing away from you such an opportunity of being settled n life, eligibly, honourably, nobly settled, as will, probably, never occur to you again. Here s a young man of sense, of character, of temper, of manners, and of fortune, exceedingly attached o you, and seeking your hand in the most handsome and disinterested way; and let me tell you, Fanny, that you may live eighteen years longer n the world, without being addressed by a man of half Mr Crawford's estate, or a tenth part of his merits. Gladly would I have bestowed either of my own daughters on him. Maria is nobly married; but had Mr Crawford sought Julia's hand, I should have given it to him with superior and more heartfelt satisfaction than I gave Maria's to Mr Rushworth." After half a moment's pause: "And I should have been very much surprised had either of my daughters, on receiving a proposal of marriage at any time which might carry with it only half the eligibility of this, immediately and peremptorily, and without paying my opinion or my regard the compliment of any consultation, put a decided negative on it. I should have thought it a gross violation of duty and respect. You are not to be judged by the same rule. You do not owe me the duty of a child. But, Fanny, if your heart can acquit you of ingratitude----"

[116]

[117]

He ceased. Fanny was by this time crying so bitterly, that, angry as he was, he would not press that article farther. Her heart was almost broke by such a picture of what she appeared to him; by such accusations, so heavy, so multiplied, so rising in dreadful gradation! Selfwilled, obstinate, selfish, and ungrateful. He thought her all this. She had deceived his expectations; she had lost his good opinion. What was to become of her?

[118]

"I am very sorry," said she, inarticulately, hrough her tears, "I am very sorry, indeed."

"Sorry! yes, I hope you are sorry; and you will probably have reason to be long sorry for this av's transactions."

"If it were possible for me to do othervise-----" said she, with another strong effort; but I am so perfectly convinced that I could never make him happy, and that I should be niserable myself."

Another burst of tears; but in spite of that ourst, and in spite of that great black word niserable, which served to introduce it, Sir Chomas began to think a little relenting, a little hange of inclination, might have something to lo with it; and to augur favourably from the personal entreaty of the young man himself. He knew her to be very timid, and exceedingly ervous; and thought it not improbable that her nind might be in such a state as a little time, a ittle pressing, a little patience, and a little impatience, a judicious mixture of all on the lover's ide, might work their usual effect on. If the gentleman would but persevere, if he had but ove enough to persevere, Sir Thomas began to ave hopes; and these reflections having passed cross his mind and cheered it, "Well," said he, n a tone of becoming gravity, but of less anger, well, child, dry up your tears. There is no use in these tears; they can do no good. You must now come downstairs with me. Mr Crawford has been kept waiting too long already. You must give him your own answer; we cannot expect him to be satisfied with less; and you only can explain to him the grounds of that misconception of your sentiments, which, unfortunately for himself, he certainly has imbibed. I am totally unequal to it."

[119]

But Fanny shewed such reluctance, such misery, at the idea of going down to him, that Sir Thomas, after a little consideration, judged it better to indulge her. His hopes from both gentleman and lady suffered a small depression in consequence; but when he looked at his niece, and saw the state of feature and complexion which her crying had brought her into, he thought there might be as much lost as gained by an immediate interview. With a few words, therefore, of no particular meaning, he walked off by himself, leaving his poor niece to sit and cry over what had passed, with very wretched feelings.

Her mind was all disorder. The past, present, future, everything was terrible. But her uncle's anger gave her the severest pain of all. Selfish and ungrateful! to have appeared so to him! She was miserable for ever. She had no one to take her part, to counsel, or speak for her.

[120]

Her only friend was absent. He might have softened his father; but all, perhaps all, would think her selfish and ungrateful. She might have to endure the reproach again and again; she might hear it, or see it, or know it to exist for ever in every connection about her. She could not but feel some resentment against Mr Crawford; yet, if he really loved her, and were unhappy too—___! It was all wretchedness together.

In about a quarter of an hour her uncle returned; she was almost ready to faint at the sight of him. He spoke calmly, however, without austerity, without reproach, and she revived a little. There was comfort, too, in his words, as well as his manner, for he began with, "Mr Crawford is gone: he has just left me. I need not repeat what has passed. I do not want to add to anything you may now be feeling, by an account of what he has felt. Suffice it, that he has behaved in the most gentlemanlike and generous manner, and has confirmed me in a most favourable opinion of his understanding, heart, and temper. Upon my representation of what you were suffering, he immediately, and with the greatest delicacy, ceased to urge to see you for the present."

Here Fanny, who had looked up, looked down again.

"Of course," continued her uncle, "it cannot be supposed but that he should request to speak with you alone, be it only for five minutes; a request too natural, a claim too just to be denied. But there is no time fixed; perhaps tomorrow, or whenever your spirits are composed enough. For the present you have only to tranquillize yourself. Check these tears; they do but exhaust you. If, as I am willing to suppose, you wish to shew me any observance, you will not give way to these emotions, but endeavour to reason yourself into a stronger frame of mind. I advise you to go out; the air will do you good; go out for an hour on the gravel; you will have the shrubbery to yourself, and will be the better for air and exercise. And, Fanny (turning back again for a moment), I shall make no mention below of what has passed; I shall not even tell your aunt Bertram. There is no occasion for spreading the disappointment; say nothing about it yourself."

This was an order to be most joyfully obeyed; this was an act of kindness which Fanny felt at her heart. To be spared from her aunt Norris's interminable reproaches! he left her in a glow of gratitude. Anything might be bearable rather than such reproaches. Even to see Mr Crawford would be less overpowering.

She walked out directly as her uncle recom-[122]

nended, and followed his advice throughout, as ar as she could; did check her tears; did earnestly ry to compose her spirits and strengthen her nind. She wished to prove to him that she did lesire his comfort, and sought to regain his avour; and he had given her another strong notive for exertion, in keeping the whole affair rom the knowledge of her aunts. Not to exite suspicion by her look or manner, was now in object worth attaining; and she felt equal to lmost anything that might save her from her unt Norris.

She was struck, quite struck, when, on returnng from her walk and going into the East room gain, the first thing which caught her eye was fire lighted and burning. A fire! it seemed oo much; just at that time to be giving her such n indulgence was exciting even painful gratiude. She wondered that Sir Thomas could have leisure to think of such a trifle again; but he soon found, from the volutary information of the housemaid, who came in to attend it, that o it was to be every day. Sir Thomas had given rders for it.

"I must be a brute, indeed, if I can be really ingrateful!" said she, in soliloquy. "Heaven befend me from being ungrateful!"

She saw nothing more of her uncle, nor of her unt Norris, till they met at dinner. Her uncle's behaviour to her was then as nearly as possible what it had been before; she was sure he did not mean there should be any change, and that it was only her own conscience that could fancy any; but her aunt was soon quarrelling with her; and when she found how much and how unpleasantly her having only walked out without her aunt's knowledge could be dwelt on, she felt all the reason she had to bless the kindness which saved her from the same spirit of reproach, exerted on a more momentous subject.

[123]

"If I had known you were going out, I should have got you just to go as far as my house with some orders for Nanny," said she, "which I have since, to my very great inconvenience, been obliged to go and carry myself. I could very ill spare the time, and you might have saved me the trouble, if you would only have been so good as to let us know you were going out. It would have made no difference to you, I suppose, whether you had walked in the shrubbery or gone to my house."

"I recommended the shrubbery to Fanny as the driest place," said Sir Thomas.

"Oh!" said Mrs Norris, with a moment's check, "that was very kind of you, Sir Thomas, but you do not know how dry the path is to my house. Fanny would have had quite as good a walk there, I assure you, with the advantage of being

[124]

f some use, and obliging her aunt: it is all her ault. If she would but have let us know she was going out—; but there is a something about l'anny, I have often observed it before—she kes to go her own way to work; she does not ke to be dictated to; she takes her own indebendent walk whenever she can; she certainly as a little spirit of secrecy, and independence, nd nonsense, about her, which I would advise her to get the better of."

As a general reflection on Fanny, Sir Thomas hought nothing could be more unjust, though he had been so lately expressing the same sentinents himself, and he tried to turn the conversaion: tried repeatedly before he could succeed; for Mrs Norris had not discernment enough to berceive, either now, or at any other time, to what legree he thought well of his niece, or how very far he was from wishing to have his own hildren's merits set off by the depreciation of hers. She was talking at Fanny, and resenting his private walk half through the dinner.

It was over, however, at last; and the evening et in with more composure to Fanny, and more heerfulness of spirits than she could have hoped for after so stormy a morning; but she trusted, in the first place, that she had done right; that her judgment had not misled her. For the purity of her intentions she could answer; and she was willing to hope, secondly, that her uncle's displeasure was abating, and would abate farther as he considered the matter with more impartiality, and felt, as a good man must feel, how wretched, and how unpardonable, how hopeless, and how wicked it was, to marry without affection.

[125]

When the meeting with which she was threatened for the morrow was past, she could not but flatter herself that the subject would be finally concluded, and Mr Crawford once gone from Mansfield, that everything would soon be as if no such subject had existed. She would not, could not believe, that Mr Crawford's affection for her could distress him long; his mind was not of that sort. London would soon bring its cure. In London he would soon learn to wonder at his infatuation, and be thankful for the right reason in her which had saved him from its evil consequences.

While Fanny's mind was engaged in these sort of hopes, her uncle was, soon after tea, called out of the room; an occurrence too common to strike her, and she thought nothing of it till the butler re-appeared ten minutes afterwards, and advancing decidedly towards herself, said, "Sir Thomas wishes to speak with you, ma'am, in his own room." Then it occurred to her what might be going on; a suspicion rushed over her mind [126] which drove the colour from her cheeks; but nstantly rising, she was preparing to obey, when Mrs Norris called out, "Stay, stay, Fanny! what are you about? where are you going? don't be n such a hurry. Depend upon it, it is not you who are wanted; depend upon it, [it] is me (lookng at the butler); but you are so very eager to put yourself forward. What should Sir Thomas want you for? It is me, Baddeley, you nean; I am coming this moment. You mean ne, Baddeley, I am sure; Sir Thomas wants me, not Miss Price."

But Baddeley was stout. "No, ma'am, it is Miss Price; I am certain of its being Miss Price." And there was a half smile with the words, which neant, "I do not think you would answer the purpose at all."

Mrs Norris, much discontented, was obliged to compose herself to work again; and Fanny, valking off in agitating consciousness, found herself, as she anticipated, in another minute alone with Mr Crawford.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE conference was neither so short nor so conclusive as the lady had designed. The gentleman was not so easily satisfied. He had all the disposition to persevere that Sir Thomas could wish him. He had vanicy, which strongly inclined him in the first place to think she did love him, though she might not know herself; and which, secondly, when constrained at last to admit that she did know her own present feelings, convinced him that he should be able in time to make those feelings what he wished.

He was in love, very much in love; and it was a love which, operating on an active, sanguine spirit, of more warmth than delicacy, made her affection appear of greater consequence because it was withheld, and determined him to have the glory, as well as the felicity, of forcing her to love him.

He would not despair: he would not desist. He had every well-grounded reason for solid attachment; he knew her to have all the worth that could justify the warmest hopes of lasting happiness with her; her conduct at this very time by speaking the disinterestedness and delicacy of her character (qualities which he believed most [128] are indeed), was of a sort to heighten all his vishes, and confirm all his resolutions. He knew not that he had a pre-engaged heart to attack. Of that he had no suspicion. He considered her ather as one who had never thought on the subect enough to be in danger; who had been guarded by youth, a youth of mind as lovely as of person; whose modesty had prevented her 'rom understanding his attentions, and who was till overpowered by the suddenness of addresses o wholly unexpected, and the novelty of a situaion which her fancy had never taken into acount.

Must it not follow of course, that, when he vas understood, he should succeed? He beieved it fully. Love such as his, in a man like imself, must with perseverence secure a return, nd at no great distance; and he had so much lelight in the idea of obliging her to love him in very short time, that her not loving him now vas scarcely regretted. A little difficulty to be wercome was no evil to Henry Crawford. He ather derived spirits from it. He had been apt o gain hearts too easily. His situation was new nd animating.

To Fanny, however, who had known too much pposition all her life to find any charm in it, Il this was unintelligible. She found that he id mean to persevere; but how he could after such language from her as she felt herself obliged to use, was not to be understood. She told him that she did not love him, could not love him, was sure she never should love him: that such a change was quite impossible; that the subject was most painful to her; that she must intreat him never to mention it again, to allow her to leave him at once, and let it be considered as concluded for ever. And when farther pressed, had added, that in her opinion their dispositions were so totally dissimilar, as to make mutual affection incompatible; and that they were unfitted for each other by nature, education, and habit. All this she had said, and with the earnestness of sincerity; yet this was not enough, for he immediately denied there being anything uncongenial in their characters, or anything unfriendly in their situations; and positively declared, that he would still love, and still hope!

[129]

Fanny knew her own meaning, but was no judge of her own manner. Her manner was incurably gentle; and she was not aware how much it concealed the sternness of her purpose. Her diffidence, gratitude, and softness, made every expression of indifference seem almost an effort of self-denial; seem, at least, to be giving nearly as much pain to herself as to him. Mr Crawford was no longer the Mr Crawford who, as the clandestine, insidious, treacherous admirer of Maria Bertram, had been her abhorrence, whom she had hated to see or to speak to, in whom she could believe no good quality to exist, and whose power, even of being agreeable, she had barely acknowledged. He was now the Mr Crawford who was addressing herself with ardent, disinterested love; whose feelings were apparently become all that was honourable and upright, whose views of happiness were all fixed on a marriage of attachment; who was pouring out his sense of her merits, describing and describing again his affection, proving, as far as words could prove it, and in the language, tone, and spirit of a man of talent, too, that he sought her for her gentleness and her goodness; and to complete the whole, he was now the Mr Crawford who had procured William's promotion!

[130]

Here was a change, and here were claims which could not but operate! She might have dislained him in all the dignity of angry virtue, n the grounds of Sotherton, or the theatre at Mansfield Park; but he approached her now with rights that demanded different treatment. She nust be courteous, and she must be compastionate. She must have a sensation of being nonoured, and whether thinking of herself or her brother, she must have a strong feeling of gratitude. The effect of the whole was a manher so pitying and agitated, and words intermingled with her refusal so expressive of obligation and concern, that to a temper of vanity and hope like Crawford's, the truth, or at least the strength of her indifference, might well be questionable; and he was not so irrational as Fanny considered him, in the professions of persevering, assiduous, and not desponding attachment which closed the interview.

[131]

It was with reluctance that he suffered her to go; but there was no look of despair in parting to bely his words, or give her hopes of his being less unreasonable than he professed himself.

Now she was angry. Some resentment did arise at a perseverance so selfish and ungenerous. Here was again a want of delicacy and regard for others which had formerly so struck and disgusted her. Here was again a something of the same Mr Crawford whom she had so reprobated before. How evidently was there a gross want of feeling and humanity where his own pleasure was concerned; and alas! how always known no principle to supply as a duty what the heart was deficient in! Had her own affections been as free as perhaps they ought to have been, he never could have engaged them.

So thought Fanny, in good truth and sober sadness, as she sat musing over that too great indulgence and luxury of a fire upstairs; wondering at what was yet to come, and in a nervous agitation which made nothing clear to her, but the persuasion of her being never under any circumstances able to love Mr Crawford, and the felicity of having a fire to sit over and think of it.

[132]

Sir Thomas was obliged, or obliged himself, to wait till the morrow for a knowledge of what had passed between the young people. He then saw Mr Crawford, and received his account. The first feeling was disappointment: he had hoped better things; he had thought that an nour's intreaty from a young man like Crawford could not have worked so little change on a gencle-tempered girl like Fanny; but there was speedy comfort in the determined views and canguine perseverance of the lover; and when seeing such confidence of success in the princibal, Sir Thomas was soon able to depend on it himself.

Nothing was omitted, on his side, of civility, compliment, or kindness, that might assist the plan. Mr Crawford's steadiness was honoured, and Fanny was praised, and the connection was till the most desirable in the world. At Mansield Park Mr Crawford would always be welome; he had only to consult his own judgment and feelings as to the frequency of his visits, t present or in future. In all his niece's family and friends, there could be but one opinion, one wish on the subject; the influence of all who loved her must incline one way.

[133]

Everything was said that could encourage, every encouragement received with grateful joy, and the gentlemen parted the best of friends.

Satisfied that the cause was now on a footing the most proper and hopeful, Sir Thomas resolved to abstain from all farther importunity with his niece, and to shew no open interference. Upon her disposition he believed kindness might be the best way of working. Intreaty should be from one quarter only. The forbearance of her family on a point, respecting which she could be in no doubt of their wishes, might be their surest means of forwarding it. Accordingly, on this principle, Sir Thomas took the first opportunity of saying to her, with a mild gravity, intended to be overcoming, "Well, Fanny, I have seen Mr Crawford again, and learnt from him exactly how matters stand between you. He is a most extraordinary young man, and whatever be the event, you must feel that you have created an attachment of no common character; though, young as you are, and little acquainted with the transient, varying, unsteady nature of love, as it generally exists, you cannot be struck as I am with all that is wonderful in a perseverance of this sort against discouragement. With him, it is entirely a matter of feeling: he claims no merit in it; perhaps is entitled to none. Yet, having chosen so well, his constancy has a respectable stamp. Had his choice been less unexceptionable, I should have condemned his persevering."

[134]

"Indeed, sir," said Fanny, "I am very sorry that Mr Crawford should continue to——I know that it is paying me a very great compliment, and I feel most undeservedly honoured; but I am so perfectly convinced, and I have told him so, that it never will be in my power——"

"My dear," interrupted Sir Thomas, "there is no occasion for this. Your feelings are as well known to me as my wishes and regrets must be to you. There is nothing more to be said or done. From this hour, the subject is never to be revived between us. You will have nothing to fear, or to be agitated about. You cannot suppose me capable of trying to persuade you to marry against your inclinations. Your happiness and dvantage are all that I have in view, and nothing s required of you but to bear with Mr Craw-'ord's endeavours to convince you that they may not be incompatible with his. He proceeds at is own risk. You are on safe ground. I have ngaged for your seeing him whenever he calls, s you might have done had nothing of this sort ccurred. You will see him with the rest of us, n the same manner, and, as much as you can, ismissing the recollection of everything unpleasant. He leaves Northamptonshire so soon, that even this slight sacrifice cannot be often demanded. The future must be very uncertain. And now, my dear Fanny, this subject is closed between us."

[135]

The promised departure was all that Fanny could think of with much satisfaction. Her uncle's kind expressions, however, and forbearing manner, were sensibly felt; and when she considered how much of the truth was unknown to him, she believed she had no right to wonder at the line of conduct he pursued. He, who had married a daughter to Mr Rushworth: romantic delicacy was certainly not expected from him. She must do her duty, and trust that time might make her duty easier than it now was.

She could not, though only eighteen, suppose Mr Crawford's attachment would hold out for ever; she could not but imagine that steady, unceasing discouragement from herself would put an end to it in time. How much time she might, in her own fancy, allot for its dominion, is another concern. It would not be fair to enquire into a young lady's exact estimate of her own perfections.

In spite of his intended silence, Sir Thomas found himself once more obliged to mention the subject to his niece, to prepare her briefly for its being imparted to her aunts; a measure which [136]

ne would still have avoided, if possible, but which became necessary from the totally opposite feelngs of Mr Crawford, as to any secrecy of proeeding. He had no idea of concealment. It vas all known at the Parsonage, where he loved o talk over the future with both his sisters, and t would be rather gratifying to him to have enightened witnesses of the progress of his success. When Sir Thomas understood this, he felt the necessity of making his own wife and sister-inaw acquainted with the business without delay; hough, on Fanny's account, he almost dreaded the effect of the communication to Mrs Norris as nuch as Fanny herself. He deprecated her misaken but well-meaning zeal. Sir Thomas, inleed, was, by this time, not very far from classng Mrs Norris as one of those well-meaning people who are always doing mistaken and very liagreeable things.

Mrs Norris, however, relieved him. He pressed for the strictest forbearance and silence owards their niece; she not only promised, but id observe it. She only looked her increased l-will. Angry she was: bitterly angry; but she vas more angry with Fanny for having received uch an offer, than for refusing it. It was an njury and affront to Julia, who ought to have een Mr Crawford's choice; and, independently f that, she disliked Fanny, because she had neglected her; and she would have grudged such an elevation to one whom she had been always trying to depress.

[137]

Sir Thomas gave her more credit for discretion on the occasion than she deserved; and Fanny could have blessed her for allowing her only to see her displeasure, and not to hear it.

Lady Bertram took it differently. She had been a beauty, and a prosperous beauty, all her life; and beauty and wealth were all that excited her respect. To know Fanny to be sought in marriage by a man of fortune, raised her, therefore, very much in her opinion. By convincing her that Fanny was very pretty, which she had been doubting about before, and that she would be advantageously married, it made her feel a sort of credit in calling her niece.

"Well, Fanny," said she, as soon as they were alone together afterwards, and she really had known something like impatience to be alone with her, and her countenance, as she spoke, had extraordinary animation; "Well, Fanny, I have had a very agreeable surprize this morning. I must just speak of it once, I told Sir Thomas I must once, and then I shall have done. I give you joy, my dear niece." And looking at her complacently, she added, "Humph, we certainly are a handsome family!"

Fanny coloured, and doubted at first what to [138] say; when hoping to assail her on her vulnerable side, she presently answered—

"My dear aunt, you cannot wish me to do differently from what I have done, I am sure. You cannot wish me to marry; for you would miss me, should not you? Yes, I am sure you would miss me too much for that."

"No, my dear, I should not think of missing you, when such an offer as this comes in your way. I could do very well without you, if you were married to a man of such good estate as Mr Crawford. And you must be aware, Fanny, that it is every young woman's duty to accept such a very unexceptionable offer as this."

This was almost the only rule of conduct, the only piece of advice, which Fanny had ever received from her aunt in the course of eight years and a half. It silenced her. She felt how unprofitable contention would be. If her aunt's feelings were against her, nothing could be hoped from attacking her understanding. Lady Bertram was quite talkative.

"I will tell you what, Fanny," said she, "I am sure he fell in love with you at the ball; I am ure the mischief was done that evening. You lid look remarkably well. Everybody said so. Sir Thomas said so. And you know you had Chapman to help you to dress. I am very glad sent Chapman to you. I shall tell Sir Thomas that I am sure it was done that evening." And still pursuing the same cheerful thoughts, she soon afterwards added, "And I will tell you what, Fanny, which is more than I did for Maria, the next time Pug has a litter you shall have a puppy."

[139]

CHAPTER XXXIV.

F DMUND had great things to hear on his return. Many surprises were awaiting him. The first that occurred was not least in interest: the appearance of Henry Crawford and his sister walking together through the village as he rode into it. He had concludedhe had meant them to be far distant. His absence had been extended beyond a fortnight purposely to avoid Miss Crawford. He was returning to Mansfield with spirits ready to feed on melancholy remembrances, and tender associations, when her own fair self was before him, leaning on her brother's arm, and he found himself receiving a welcome, unquestionably friendly, from the woman whom, two moments before, he had been thinking of as seventy miles off. and as farther, much farther, from him in inclination than any distance could express.

Her reception of him was of a sort which [140]

he could not have hoped for, had he expected to see her. Coming as he did from such a purport fulfilled as had taken him away, he would have expected anything rather than a look of satisfaction, and words of simple, pleasant meaning. It was enough to set his heart in a glow, and to bring him home in the properest state for feeling the full value of the other joyful surprises at hand.

William's promotion, with all its particulars, he was soon master of; and with such a secret provision of comfort within his own breast to help the joy, he found in it a source of most gratifying sensation, and unvarying cheerfulness all dinner-time.

After dinner, when he and his father were alone, he had Fanny's history; and then all the great events of the last fortnight, and the present situation of matters at Mansfield were known to him.

Fanny suspected what was going on. They sat so much longer than usual in the dining-parlour, that she was sure they must be talking of her; and when tea at last brought them away, and she was seen by Edmund again, she felt dreadfully guilty. He came to her, sat down by her, took her hand, and pressed it kindly; and at the moment she thought that, but for the occupation and the scene which the tea-things afforded, she must have betrayed her emotion in some unpardonable excess.

[141]

He was not intending, however, by such action, to be conveying to her that unqualified approbation and encouragement which her hopes drew from it. It was designed only to express his participation in all that interested her, and to tell her that he had been hearing what quickened every feeling of affection. He was, in fact, entirely on his father's side of the question. His surprise was not so great as his father's at her refusing Crawford, because, so far from supposing her to consider him with anything like a preference, he had always believed it to be rather the reverse, and could imagine her to be taken perfectly unprepared, but Sir Thomas could not regard the connection as more desirable than he did. It had every recommendation to him; and while honouring her for what she had done under the influence of her present indifference, honouring her in rather stronger terms than Sir Thomas could quite echo, he was most earnest in hoping, and sanguine in believing, than it would be a match at last, and that, united by mutual affection, it would appear that their dispositions were as exactly fitted to make them blessed in each other, as he was now beginning seriously to consider them. Crawford had been too precipitate. He had not given her time to [142] attach herself. He had begun at the wrong end. With such powers as his, however, and such a disposition as hers, Edmund trusted that everything would work out a happy conclusion. Mean while, he saw enough of Fanny's embarrassment to make him scrupulously guard against exciting it a second time, by any word, or look, or movement.

Crawford called the next day, and on the score of Edmund's return, Sir Thomas felt himself more than licensed to ask him to stay dinner; it was really a necessary compliment. He staid of course, and Edmund had then ample opportunity for observing how he sped with Fanny, and what degree of immediate encouragement for him might be extracted from her manners; and it was so little, so very, very little, (every chance, every possibility of it, resting upon her embarrassment only: if there was not hope in her confusion, there was hope in nothing else), that he was almost ready to wonder at his friend's perseverance. Fanny was worth it all; he held her to be worth every effort of patience, every exertion of mind, but he did not think he could have gone on himself with any woman breathing, without something more to warm his courage than his eyes could discern in hers. He was very willing to hope that Crawford saw clearer, and · his was the most comfortable conclusion for his friend that he could come to form all that he observed to pass before, and at, and after dinner.

[143]

In the evening a few circumstances occurred which he thought more promising. When he and Crawford walked into the drawing-room, his mother and Fanny were sitting as intently and silently at work as if there were nothing else to care for. Edmund could not help noticing their apparently deep tranquillity.

"We have not been so silent all the time," replied his mother. "Fanny has been reading to me, and only put the book down upon hearing you coming." And sure enough there was a book on the table which had the air of being very recently closed: a volume of Shakespeare. "She often reads to me out of those books; and she was in the middle of a very fine speech of that man's—what's his name, Fanny?—when we heard your footsteps."

Crawford took the volume. "Let me have the pleasure of finishing that speech to your ladyship," said he. "I shall find it immediately." And by carefully giving way to the inclination of the leaves, he did find it, or within a page or two, quite near enough to satisfy Lady Bertram, who assured him, as soon as he mentioned the name of Cardinal Wolsey, that he had got the very speech. Not a look, or an offer of help had Fanny given; not a syllable for or against. [144]

All her attention was for her work. She seemed letermined to be interested by nothing else. But aste was too strong in her. She could not abstract her mind five minutes; she was forced to isten; his reading was capital, and her pleasure n good reading extreme. To good reading, nowever, she had been long used; her uncle read well, her cousins all, Edmund very well, but in Mr Crawford's reading there was a variety of excellence beyond what she had ever met with. The King, the Queen, Buckingham, Wolsey, Cromwell, all were given in turn; for with the appiest knack, the happiest power of jumping and guessing, he could always alight at will on he best scene, or the best speeches of each; and whether it were dignity or pride, or tenderness or remorse, or whatever were to be expressed, e could do it with equal beauty. It was truly lramatic. His acting had first taught Fanny vhat pleasure a play might give, and his reading rought all his acting before her again; nay, perhaps with greater enjoyment, for it came unxpectedly, and with no such drawback as she ad been used to suffer in seeing him on the stage vith Miss Bertram.

Edmund watched the progress of her attenion, and was amused and gratified by seeing how he gradually slackened in the needle-work, which t the beginning, seemed to occupy her totally; how it fell from her hand while she sat motionless over it, and at last, how the eyes which had appeared so studiously to avoid him throughout the day, were turned and fixed on Crawford; fixed on him for minutes, fixed on him, in short, till the attraction drew Crawford's upon her, and the book was closed, and the charm was broken. Then she was shrinking again into herself, and blushing and working as hard as ever; but it had been enough to give Edmund encouragement for his friend, and as he cordially thanked him, he hoped to be expressing Fanny's secret feelings too.

[145]

"That play must be a favourite with you," said he; "you read as if you knew it well."

"It will be a favourite, I believe, from this hour," replied Crawford; "but I do not think I have had a volume of Shakespeare in my hand before since I was fifteen. I once saw Henry the 8th acted, or I have heard of it from somebody who did, I am not certain which. But Shakespeare one gets acquainted with without knowing how. It is a part of an Englishman's constitution. His thoughts and beauties are so spread abroad that one touches them everywhere; one is intimate with him by instinct. No man of any brain can open at a good part of one of his plays without falling into the flow of his meaning immediately."

[146]

She could not abstract her mind five minutes; she was forced to listen; his reading was capital

"No doubt one is familiar with Shakespeare a a degree," said Edmund, "from one's earliest ears. His celebrated passages are quoted by verybody; they are in half the books we open, nd we all talk Shakespeare, use his similes, and escribe with his descriptions; but this is totally istinct from giving his sense as you gave it. To know him in bits and scraps is common nough; to know him pretty thoroughly is, peraps, not uncommon; but to read him well aloud a no every-day talent."

"Sir, you do me honour," was Crawford's nswer, with a bow of mock gravity.

Both gentlemen had a glance at Fanny, to see f a word of accordant praise could be extorted from her; yet both feeling that it could not be. Her praise had been given in her attention: that must content them.

Lady Bertram's admiration was expressed, and trongly too. "It was really like being at a play," said she. "I wish Sir Thomas had been here."

Crawford was excessively pleased. If Lady Bertram, with all her incompetency and languor, ould feel this, the inference of what her niece, live and enlightened as she was, must feel, was levating.

"You have a great turn for acting, I am sure, Ir Crawford," said her ladyship soon afterwards; "and I will tell you what, I think you will have a theatre, some time or other, at your house in Norfolk. I mean when you are settled there. I do, indeed. I think you will fit up a theatre at your house in Norfolk."

[147]

"Do you, ma'am?" cried he, with quickness. "No, no, that will never be. Your ladyship is quite mistaken. No theatre at Everingham! Oh, no!" And he looked at Fanny with an expressive smile, which evidently meant, "that lady will never allow a theatre at Everingham."

Edmund saw it all, and saw Fanny so determined not to see it, as to make it clear that the voice was enough to convey the full meaning of the protestation; and such a quick consciousness of compliment, such a ready comprehension of a hint, he thought, was rather favourable than not.

The subject of reading aloud was farther discussed. The two young men were the only talkers, but they, standing by the fire, talked over the too common neglect of the qualification, the total inattention to it, in the ordinary schoolsystem for boys, the consequently natural, yet in some instances almost unnatural, degree of ignorance and uncouthness of men, of sensible and well-informed men, when suddenly called to the necessity of reading aloud, which had fallen within their notice, giving instances of [148] lunders, and failures with their secondary auses, the want of management of the voice, of roper modulation and emphasis, of foresight nd judgment, all proceeding from the first ause: want of early attention and habit; and Fanny was listening again with great entertainnent.

"Even in my profession," said Edmund, with smile, "how little the art of reading has been tudied! how little a clear manner, and good devery, have been attended to! I speak rather f the past, however, than the present. There s now a spirit of improvement abroad; but mong those who were ordained twenty, thirty, orty years ago, the larger number, to judge by heir performance, must have thought reading vas reading, and preaching was preaching. It s different now. The subject is more justly considered. It is felt that distinctness and enrgy may have weight in recommending the most olid truths; and besides there is more general bservation and taste, a more critical knowledge liffused than formerly; in every congregation here is a larger proportion who know a little of he matter, and who can judge and criticize."

Edmund had already gone through the serrice once since his ordination; and upon this beng understood, he had a variety of questions from Crawford as to his feelings and success; questions, which being made, though with the vivacity of friendly interest and quick taste, without any touch of that spirit of banter or air of levity which Edmund knew to be most offensive to Fanny, he had true pleasure in satisfying: and when Crawford proceeded to ask his opinion and give his own as to the properest manner in which particular passages in the service should be delivered, showing it to be a subject on which he had thought before, and thought with judgment, Edmund was still more and more pleased. This would be the way to Fanny's heart. She was not to be won by all that gallantry and wit and good-nature together, could do; or at least she would not be won by them nearly so soon, without the assistance of sentiment and feeling, and seriousness on serious subjects.

[149]

"Our liturgy," observed Crawford, "has beauties, which not even a careless, slovenly style of reading can destroy; but it has also redundancies and repetitions which require good reading not to be felt. For myself, at least, I must confess being not always so attentive as I ought to be" (here was a glance at Fanny); "that nineteen times out of twenty, I am thinking how such a prayer ought to be read, and longing to have it to read myself. Did you speak?" stepping eagerly to Fanny, and addressing her in a softened voice; and upon her saying "No," he dded, "Are you sure you did not speak? I saw our lips move. I fancied you might be going tell me I ought to be more attentive, and not low my thoughts to wander. Are not you goag to tell me so?"

[150]

"No, indeed, you know your duty too well for the to-even supposing-----"

She stopt, felt herself getting into a puzzle, and could not be prevailed on to add another ord, not by dint of several minutes of suppliation and waiting. He then returned to his ormer station, and went on as if there had been to such tender interruption.

"A sermon, well delivered, is more uncommon ven than prayers well read. A sermon, good itself, is no rare thing. It is more difficult to peak well than to compose well; that is, the ales and trick of composition are oftener an bject of study. A thoroughly good sermon, noroughly well delivered, is a capital gratifiation. I can never hear such a one without the reatest admiration and respect, and more than alf a mind to take orders and preach myself. here is something in the eloquence of the pulpit, hen it is really eloquence, which is entitled to ne highest praise and honour. The preacher ho can touch and affect such an heterogeneous nass of hearers, on subjects limited, and long orn threadbare in all common hands; who can say anything new or striking, anything that rouses the attention, without offending the taste, or wearing out the feelings of his hearers, is a man whom one could not in his public capacity honour enough. I should like to be such a man."

[151]

Edmund laughed.

"I should indeed. I never listened to a distinguished preacher in my life without a sort of envy. But then, I must have a London audience. I could not preach but to the educated; to those who were capable of estimating my composition. And I do not know that I should be fond of preaching often; now and then, perhaps, once or twice in the spring, after being anxiously expected for half-a-dozen Sundays together; but not for a constancy; it would not do for a constancy."

Here Fanny, who could not but listen, involuntarily shook her head, and Crawford was instantly by her side again, intreating to know her meaning; and as Edmund perceived, by his drawing in a chair, and sitting down close by her, that it was to be a very thorough attack, that look and undertones were to be well tried, he sank as quietly as possible into a corner, turned his back, and took up a newspaper, very sincerely wishing that dear little Fanny might be persuaded in ) explaining away that shake of the head to the satisfaction of her ardent lover; and as earnestly try-

[152]

g to bury every sound of the business from nself in murmurs of his own, over the various vertisements of "A most desirable Estate in outh Wales;" "To Parents and Guardians;" d a "Capital season'd Hunter."

Fanny, meanwhile, vexed with herself for not ving been as motionless as she was speechless, ad grieved to the heart to see Edmund's arngements, was trying by everything in the ower of her modest, gentle nature, to repulse Mr rawford, and avoid both his looks and enquiries; ad he, unrepulsable, was persisting in both.

"What did that shake of the head mean?" id he. "What was it meant to express? Disprobation, I fear. But of what? What had been saying to displease you? Did you think e peaking improperly, lightly, irreverently on e subject? Only tell me if I was. Only tell e if I was wrong. I want to be set right. ay, nay, I intreat you; for one moment put own your work. What did that shake of the ead mean?"

Ir vain was her "Pray, sir, don't; pray, Mr rawford;" repeated twice over; and in vain did he try to move away. In the same low, eager bice and the same close neighbourhood, he went h, re-urging the same questions as before. She rew more agitated and displeased.

"How can you, sir? You quite astonish me; wonder how you can-"

[153]

"Do I astonish you?" said he. "Do you wor der? Is there anything in my present intreat that you do not understand? I will explain a that makes me urge you in this manner, all tha gives me an interest in what you look and do and excites my present curiosity. I will not leav you to wonder long."

In spite of herself, she could not help half smile, but she said nothing.

"You shook your head at my acknowledgin, that I should not like to engage in the duties o a clergyman always for a constancy. Yes, tha was the word. Constancy: I am not afraid o the word. I would spell it, read it, write it wit anybody. I see nothing alarming in the wor-Did you think I ought?"

"Perhaps, sir," said Fanny, wearied at las into speaking; "perhaps, sir, I thought it was pity you did not always know yourself as we as you seemed to do that moment."

Crawford, delighted to get her to speak a any rate, was determined to keep it up; and poo Fanny, who had hoped to silence him by such a extremity of reproof, found herself sadly mis taken, and that it was only a change from on object of curiosity and one set of words to an other. He had always something to intreat th explanation of. The opportunity was too fain None such had occurred since his seeing he her uncle's room, none such might occur ain before his leaving Mansfield. Lady Berm's being just on the other side of the table as a trifle, for she might always be considered only half awake, and Edmund's advertiseents were still of the first utility.

[154]

"Well," said Crawford, after a course of rapid estions and reluctant answers; "I am happier an I was, because I now understand more clearly ur opinion of me. You think me unsteady; sily swayed by the whim of the moment, easily npted, easily put aside. With such an opinion, wonder that-----. But we shall see. It is t by protestations that I shall endeavour to nvince you I am wronged; it is not by telling u that my affections are steady. My conduct all speak for me; absence, distance, time shall eak for me. They shall prove that, as far as u can be deserved by anybody, I do deserve u. You are infinitely my superior in merit; that I know. You have qualities which I had t before supposed to exist in such a degree in y human creature. You have some touches of e angel in you beyond what—not merely beyond nat one sees, because one never sees anything e it—but beyond what one fancies might be. it still I am not frightened. It is not by uality of merit that you can be won. That is t of the question. It is he who sees and worships your merit the strongest, who loves you most devotedly, that has the best right to a return. There I build my confidence. By tha right I do and will deserve you; and when once convinced that my attachment is what I declarit, I know you too well not to entertain the warm est hopes. Yes, dearest, sweetest Fanny Nay—" (seeing her draw back displeased)— "forgive me. Perhaps I have as yet no right but by what other name can I call you? Do you suppose you are ever present to my imagi nation under any other? No, it is 'Fanny' tha I think of all day, and dream of all night. You have given the name such reality of sweetness that nothing else can now be descriptive of you."

[155]

Fanny could hardly have kept her seat any longer, or have refrained from at least trying to get away in spite of all the too public opposition she foresaw to it, had it not been for the sound of approaching relief, the very sound which she had been long watching for, and long thinking strangely delayed.

The solemn procession, headed by Baddeley of teaboard, urn, and cake-bearers, made its appearance, and delivered her from a grievous imprisonment of body and mind. Mr Crawford was obliged to move. She was at liberty, she was busy, she was protected.

Edmund was not sorry to be admitted again [156] nong the number of those who might speak nd hear. But though the conference had emed full long to him, and though on looking Fanny he saw rather a flush of vexation, he clined to hope that so much could not have been id and listened to, without some profit to the beaker.

CHAPTER XXXV.

E DMUND had determined that it belonged entirely to Fanny to show situation with regard to Crawford should e mentioned between them or not; and that if ne did not lead the way, it should never be ouched on by him; but after a day or two of utual reserve, he was induced by his father to nange his mind, and try what his influence might o for his friend.

A day, and a very early day, was actually xed for the Crawfords' departure; and Sir homas thought it might be as well to make one ore effort for the young man before he left lansfield, that all his professions and vows of nshaken attachment might have as much hope sustain them as possible.

Sir Thomas was most cordially anxious for e perfection of Mr Crawford's character in that point. He wished him to be a model o constancy; and fancied the best means of effect ing it would be by not trying him too long.

[157]

Edmund was not unwilling to be persuaded to engage in the business; he wanted to know Fanny's feelings. She had been used to consul him in every difficulty, and he loved her too well to bear to be denied her confidence now; he hoped to be of service to her, he thought he must b of service to her; whom else had she to open he heart to? If she did not need counsel, she must need comfort of communication. Fanny est tranged from him, silent, and reserved, wa an unnatural state of things; a state which h must break through, and which he could easillearn to think she was wanting him to break through.

"I will speak to her, sir: I will take the first opportunity of speaking to her alone," was the result of such thoughts as these; and upon Si Thomas's information of her being at that very time walking alone in the shrubbery, he instantly joined her.

"I am come to walk with you, Fanny," said he. "Shall I?" Drawing her arm within his "It is a long while since we have had a comfort able walk together."

She assented to it all rather by look than word Her spirits were low.

[158]

"But, Fanny," he presently added, "in order have a comfortable walk, something more is cessary than merely pacing this gravel toether. You must talk to me. I know you we something on your mind. I know what ou are thinking of. You cannot suppose me hinformed. Am I to hear of it from everyody but Fanny herself?"

Fanny, at once agitated and dejected, replied, f you hear of it from everybody, cousin, there n be nothing for me to tell."

"Not of facts, perhaps; but of feelings, Fanny. o one but you can tell me them. I do not mean press you, however. If it is not what you ish yourself, I have done. I had thought it ight be a relief."

"I am afraid we think too differently? I have o idea of it. I dare say, that on a comparison o our opinions, they would be found as much ike as they have been used to be: to the point consider Crawford's proposals as most advangeous and desirable, if you could return his fection. I consider it as most natural that your family should wish you could return it; t that as you cannot, you have done exactly you ought in refusing him. Can there be any sagreement between us here?"

"Oh, no! But I thought you blamed me. I ought you were against me. This is such a mfort!"

[159]

"This comfort you might have had sooner Fanny, had you sought it. But how could yo possibly suppose me against you? How coul you imagine me an advocate for marriage with out love? Were I even careless in general o such matters, how could you imagine me so when your happiness was at stake?"

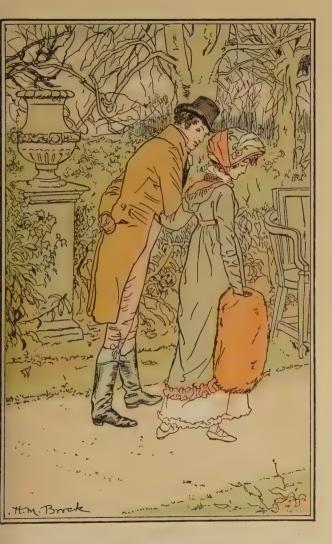

"My uncle thought me wrong, and I knew h had been talking to you."

"As far as you have gone, Fanny, I thin you perfectly right. I may be sorry, I may be surprised: though hardly that, for you had not had time to attach yourself: but I think you per fectly right. Can it admit of a question? I is disgraceful to us if it does. You did not low him; nothing could have justified your accept ing him."

Fanny had not felt so comfortable for day and days.

"So far your conduct has been faultless, an they were quite mistaken who wished you to d otherwise. But the matter does not end here Crawford's is no common attachment; he per severes, with the hope of creating that regar which had not been created before. This, w know, must be a work of time. But" (with a affectionate smile), "let him succeed at lass Fanny, let him succeed at last. You hav proved yourself upright and disinterested, prov

[160]

I know you have something on your mind. I know what you are thinking of urself grateful and tender-hearted; and then a will be the perfect model of a woman, which have always believed you born for."

'Oh! never, never, never! he never will succeed the me." And she spoke with a warmth which ite astonished Edmund, and which she blushed the recollection of herself, when she saw his ok, and heard him reply, "Never! Fanny! very determined and positive! This is not e yourself, your rational self."

"I mean," she cried, sorrowfully correcting rself, "that I think I never shall, as far as the ture can be answered for; I think I never all return his regard."

"I must hope better things. I am aware, more are than Crawford can be, that the man who cans to make you love him (you having due tice of his intentions) must have very up-hill rk, for there are all your early attachments and bits in battle array; and before he can get your art for his own use he has to unfasten it from the holds upon things animate and inanimate, ich so many years' growth have confirmed, d which are considerably tightened for the oment by the very idea of separation. I know at the apprehension of being forced to quit ansfield will for a time be arming you against h. I wish he had not been obliged to tell you at he was trying for. I wish he had known you as well as I do, Fanny. Between us, I thi we should have won you. My theoretical a his practical knowledge together, could not ha failed. He should have worked upon my plan I must hope, however, that time proving h (as I firmly believe it will), to deserve you his steady affection, will give him his reward. cannot suppose that you have not the wish to lo him—the natural wish of gratitude. You mu have some feeling of that sort. You must sorry for your own indifference."

[161]

"We are so totally unlike," said Fanny, avoid ing a direct answer, "we are so very, very diferent in all our inclinations and ways, the I consider it as quite impossible we should evbe tolerably happy together, even if I could lihim. There never were two people more dsimilar. We have not one taste in commo-We should be miserable."

"You are mistaken, Fanny. The dissimilari is not so strong. You are quite enough alil-You have tastes in common. You have mor and literary tastes in common. You have bo warm hearts and benevolent feelings; an Fanny, who that heard him read, and saw yo listen to Shakespeare the other night, will thin you unfitted as companions? You forget you self: there is a decided difference in your ter pers, I allow. He is lively, you are serious; b [162]

o much the better; his spirits will support yours. t is your disposition to be easily dejected and o fancy difficulties greater than they are. His heerfulness will counteract this. He sees difculties nowhere: and his pleasantness and gaiety ill be a constant support to you. Your being o far unlike, Fanny, does not in the smallest egree make against the probability of your hapiness together: do not imagine it. I am myelf convinced that it is rather a favourable cirumstance. I am perfectly persuaded that the empers had better be unlike: I mean unlike in ne flow of the spirits, in the manners, in the inlination for much or little company, in the proensity to talk or to be silent, to be grave or to e gay. Some opposition here is, I am thoroughly onvinced, friendly to matrimonial happiness. exclude extremes, of course; and a very close esemblance in all those points would be the likeest way to produce an extreme. A countertion, gentle and continual, is the best safeuard of manners and conduct."

Full well could Fanny guess where his oughts were now, Miss Crawford's power was I returning. He had been speaking of her eerfully from the hour of his coming home. Is avoiding her was quite at an end. He had ned at the Parsonage only the preceding day. After leaving him to his happier thoughts for some minutes, Fanny feeling it due to herse returned to Mr Crawford, and said, "It is r merely in temper that I consider him as tota unsuited to myself, though in that respect, think the difference between us too great, i finitely too great; his spirits often oppress m but there is something in him which I object still more. I must say, cousin, that I cann approve his character. I have not thought w of him from the time of the play. I then sa him behaving, as it appeared to me, so very in properly and unfeelingly-I may speak of now because it is all over-so improperly poor Mr Rushworth, not seeming to care ho he exposed or hurt him, and paying attentio to my cousin Maria, which—in short, at the tin of the play, I received an impression which w never be got over."

[163]

"My dear Fanny," replied Edmund, scarce hearing her to the end, "let us not, any of u be judged by what we appeared at that period of general folly. The time of the play is a time which I hate to recollect. Maria was wron, Crawford was wrong, we were all wrong to gether; but none so wrong as myself. Compared with me, all the rest were blameless. I was playing the fool with my eyes open."

"As a by-stander," said Fanny, "perhaps saw more than you did; and I do think that M Rushworth was sometimes very jealous."

[164]

"Very possibly. No wonder. Nothing could more improper than the whole business. I in shocked whenever I think that Maria could capable of it; but, if she could undertake the art, we must not be surprised at the rest."

"Before the play, I am much mistaken, if ulia did not think he was paying her attenons."

"Julia! I have heard before from some one his being in love with Julia; but I could never e anything of it. And, Fanny, though I hope do justice to my sisters' good qualities, I think very possible that they might, one or both, e more desirous of being admired by Crawford, nd might shew that desire rather more unguardlly than was perfectly prudent. I can rememer that they were evidently fond of his society; nd with such encouragement, a man like Craword, lively, and it may be, a little unthinking, ight be led on to-There could be nothing very riking, because it is clear that he had no prensions: his heart was reserved for you. And must say, that its being for you has raised him conceivably in my opinion. It does him the ghest honour; it shows his proper estimation f the blessing of domestic happiness and pure tachment. It proves him unspoilt by his uncle. proves him, in short, everything that I had een used to wish to believe him, and feared he as not."

"I am persuaded that he does not think, as h ought, on serious subjects."

"Say, rather, that he has not thought at a upon serious subjects, which I believe to be good deal the case. How could it be otherwise with such an education and adviser? Under th disadvantages, indeed, which both have had, is i not wonderful that they should be what they are Crawford's feelings, I am ready to acknowledge have hitherto been too much his guides. Happily those feelings have generally been good. You will supply the rest; and a most fortunate man he is to attach himself to such a creature-to : woman, who firm as a rock in her own principles has a gentleness of character so well adapted to recommend them. He has chosen his partner indeed, with rare felicity; he will make you happy Fanny; I know he will make you happy; bu you will make him everything."

"I would not engage in such a charge," cried Fanny, in a shrinking accent; "in such an office of high responsibility!"

"As usual, believing yourself unequal to any thing! fancying everything too much for you Well, though I may not be able to persuade you into different feelings, you will be persuaded into them, I trust. I have no common interest in Crawford's well-doing. Next to your happiness Fanny, his has the first claim on me. You are [166] ware of my having no common interest in Craword."

Fanny was too well aware of it to have anyning to say; and they walked on together some fty yards in mutual silence and abstraction. Idmund first began again:—

"I was very much pleased by her manner of peaking of it yesterday, particularly pleased, ecause I had not depended upon her seeing verything in so just a light. I knew she was ery fond of you; but yet I was afraid of her not stimating your worth to her brother quite as it eserved, and of her regretting that he had not ather fixed on some woman of distinction or forune. I was afraid of the bias of those worldly naxims, which she has been too much used to hear. But it was very different. She spoke of you, anny, just as she ought. She desires the conection as warmly as your uncle or myself. We ad a long talk about it. I should not have menoned the subject, though very anxious to know er sentiments; but I had not been in the room ve minutes, before she began introducing it with ll that openness of heart, and sweet peculiarity f manner, that spirit and ingenuousness which e so much a part of herself. Mrs Grant ughed at her for her rapidity."

"Was Mrs Grant in the room, then?" "Yes, when I reached the house, I found the two sisters together by themselves; and when one we had begun, we had not done with you, Fann till Crawford and Dr Grant came in."

[167]

"It is above a week since I saw Miss Craw ford."

"Yes, she laments it; yet owns it may have been best. You will see her, however, before she goe She is very angry with you, Fanny; you must h prepared for that. She calls herself very angry but you can imagine her anger. It is the regre and disappointment of a sister, who thinks he brother has a right to everything he may wish fo at the first moment. She is hurt, as you would be for William; but she loves and esteems you with all her heart."

"I knew she would be very angry with me."

"My dearest Fanny," cried Edmund, pressin her arm closer to him, "do not let the idea of he anger distress you. It is anger to be talked of rather than felt. Her heart is made for low and kindness, not for resentment. I wish yo could have overheard her tribute of praise; I wis you could have seen her countenance, when sh said that you should be Henry's wife. And observed, that she always spoke of you a 'Fanny,' which she was never used to do; and had a sound of most sisterly cordiality."

"And Mrs Grant, did she say-did she speal was she there all the time?"

[168]

"Yes, she was agreeing exactly with her sister. he surprise of your refusal, Fanny, seems to ve been unbounded. That you could refuse the a man as Henry Crawford, seems more than ey can understand. I said what I could for u; but in good truth, as they stated the case u must prove yourself to be in your senses as on as you can, by a different conduct; nothing e will satisfy them. But this is teazing you. have done. Do not turn away from me."

"I should have thought," said Fanny, after a use of recollection and exertion, "that every man must have felt the possibility of a man's t being approved, not being loved by some one her sex, at least, let him be ever so generally reeable. Let him have all the perfections in e world, I think it ought not to be set down as tain, that a man must be acceptable to every man he may happen to like himself. But, en supposing it is so, allowing Mr Crawford have all the claims which his sisters think he s, how was I to be prepared to meet him with y feeling answerable to his own! He took me olly by surprise. I had not an idea that this naviour to me before had any meaning; and ely I was not to be teaching myself to like him ly because he was taking what seemed very idle tice of me. In my situation, it would have been extreme of vanity to be forming expectations on Mr Crawford. I am sure his sisters, rating him as they do, must have thought it so, suppose ing he had meant nothing. How, then, was it to be—to be in love with him the moment he said he was with me? How was I to have an attach ment at his serivce, as soon as it was asked for His sisters should consider me as well as him. The higher his deserts, the more improper for me even to have thought of him. And, and—we think very differently of the nature of women, if they can imagine a woman so very soon capable of returning an affection, as this seems to imply."

[169]

"My dear, dear Fanny, now I have the truth I know this to be the truth; and most worthy of you are such feelings. I had attributed them to you before. I thought I could understand you You have now given exactly the explanation which I ventured to make for you to your friend and Mrs Grant, and they were both better satisfied, though your warm-hearted friend was still run away with a little, by the enthusiasm of her fondness for Henry. I told them, that you were of all human creatures the one over whom habit had most power and novelty least; and that the very circumstance of the novelty of Crawford's addresses was against him. This being so new and so recent was all in the disfavour; that you could tolerate nothing that you were not used to and a great deal more to the same purpose, to [170]

ive them a knowledge of your character. Miss rawford made us laugh by her plans of encourgement for her brother. She meant to urge him persevere in the hope of being loved in time, and of having his addresses most kindly received to the end of about ten years' happy marriage."

Fanny could with difficulty give the smile that as here asked for. Her feelings were all in wolt. She feared she had been doing wrong: uying too much, overacting the caution which he had been fancying necessary; in guarding gainst one evil, laying herself open to another; he to have Miss Crawford's liveliness repeated her at such a moment, and on such a subject, as a bitter aggravation.

Edmund saw weariness and distress in her face, ad immediately resolved to forbear all farther scussion; and not even to mention the name of rawford again, except as it might be connected ith what must be agreeable to her. On this prinple, he soon afterwards observed—

"They go on Monday. You are sure, thereore, of seeing your friend either to-morrow or unday. They really go on Monday; and I was ithin a trifle of being persuaded to stay at Lesngby till that very day! I had almost promised

What a difference it might have made! Those re or six days more at Lessingby might have en felt all my life."

[171]

"You were near staying there?"

"Very. I was most kindly pressed, and ha nearly consented. Had I received any letter from Mansfield, to tell me how you were all going on I believe I should certainly have staid; but I knew nothing that had happened here for a fortnigh had felt that I had been away long enough."

"You spent your time pleasantly there?"

"Yes; that is, it was the fault of my own min if I did not. They were all very pleasant. doubt their finding me so. I took uneasines with me, and there was no getting rid of it ti I was in Mansfield again."

"The Miss Owens—you liked them, did no you?"

"Yes, very well. Pleasant, good-humoure unaffected girls. But I am spoilt, Fanny, fo common female society. Good-humoured, una fected girls will not do for a man who has bee used to sensible women. They are two distin orders of being. You and Miss Crawford hav made me too nice."

Still, however, Fanny was oppressed and wea ied; he saw it in her looks, it could not be talke away; and in attempting it no more, he led h directly, with the kind authority of a privilege guardian, into the house.

[172]

CHAPTER XXXVI.

DMUND now believed himself perfectly acquainted with all that Fanny could tell, or could leave to be conjectured of her ntiments, and he was satisfied. It had been, as before presumed, too hasty a measure on rawford's side, and time must be given to make e idea first familiar, and then agreeable to her. he must be used to the consideration of his being love with her, and then a return of affection ight not be very distant.

He gave this opinion as the result of the conrsation to his father; and recommended there ing nothing more said to her; no farther atmpts to influence or persuade; but that everying should be left to Crawford's assiduities, d the natural workings of her own mind.

Sir Thomas promised that it should be so. Edand's account of Fanny's disposition he could lieve to be just; he supposed she had all those elings, but he must consider it as very unfornate that she had; for, less willing than his son trust to the future, he could not help fearing at if such very long allowances of time and bit were necessary for her, she might not have rsuaded herself into receiving his addresses operly, before the young man's inclination for paying them were over. There was nothing to be done, however, but to submit quietly and hope the best.

[173]

The promised visit from "her friend," as Edmund called Miss Crawford, was a formidable threat to Fanny, and she lived in continual terror of it. As a sister, so partial and so angry, and so little scrupulous of what she said, and in another light so triumphant and secure, she was in every way an object of painful alarm. Her displeasure, her penetration and her happiness were all fearful to encounter; and the dependence of having others present when they met, was Fanny's only support in looking forward to it She absented herself as little as possible from Lady Bertram, kept away from the East room and took no solitary walk in the shrubbery, in her caution to avoid any sudden attack.

She succeeded. She was safe in the breakfastroom, with her aunt, when Miss Crawford did come; and the first misery over, and Miss Crawford looking and speaking with much less particularity of expression than she had anticipated Fanny began to hope there would be nothing worse to be endured than an half hour of moderate agitation. But here she hoped too much Miss Crawford was not the slave of opportunity She was determined to see Fanny alone, and therefore said to her tolerably soon, in a low oice, "I must speak to you for a few minutes omewhere;" words that Fanny felt all over her, a all her pulses and all her nerves. Denial was npossible. Her habits of ready submission, on he contrary, made her almost instantly rise and ead the way out of the room. She did it with retched feelings, but it was inevitable.

[174]

They were no sooner in the hall than all reraint of countenance was over on Miss Craword's side. She immediately shook her head t Fanny with arch, yet affectionate reroach, and taking her hand, seemed hardly ble to help beginning directly. She said nothng, however, but, "Sad, sad girl! I do not know hen I shall have done scolding you," and had iscretion enough to reserve the rest till they ight be secure of having four walls to themelves. Fanny naturally turned upstairs, and ook her guest to the apartment which was now ways fit for comfortable use; opening the door, owever, with a most aching heart, and feeling hat she had a more distressing scene before her nan ever that spot had yet witnessed. But the ril ready to burst on her, was at least delayed y the sudden change in Miss Crawford's ideas; y the strong effect on her mind which the findg herself in the East room again produced.

"Ha!" she cried, with instant animation, "am here again? The East room! Once only was I in this room before;" and after stopping to loo about her, and seemingly to retrace all that has then passed, she added, "once only before. D you remember it? I came here to rehearse. You cousin came too; and we had a rehearsal. You were our audience and prompter. A delightfur rehearsal. I shall never forget it. Here we were just in this part of the room; here was you cousin, here was I, here were the chairs. Oh why will such things ever pass away?"

[175]

Happily for her companion, she wanted no answer. Her mind was entirely self-engrossed She was in a reverie of sweet remembrances.

"The scene we were rehearsing was so ver remarkable! The subject of it so very-verywhat shall I say? He was to be describing and recommending matrimony to me. I think I se him now, trying to be as demure and composed as Anhalt ought, through the two long speeches 'When two sympathetic hearts meet in the mar riage state, matrimony may be called a happy life.' I suppose no time can ever wear out the impression I have of his looks and voice as he said those words. It was curious, very curiou that we should have such a scene to play! If ] had the power of recalling any one week of my existence, it should be that week-that acting week. Say what you would, Fanny, it should be that; for I never knew such exquisite happines any other. His sturdy spirit to bend as it did! h! it was sweet beyond expression. But alas, at very evening destroyed it all. That very ening brought your most unwelcome uncle. oor Sir Thomas, who was glad to see you? Yet, anny, do not imagine I would now speak disspectfully of Sir Thomas, though I certainly d hate him for many a week. No, I do him stice now. He is just what the head of such a mily should be. Nay, in sober sadness, I believe now love you all." And having said so, with degree of tenderness and consciousness which anny had never seen in her before, and now ought only too becoming, she turned away for noment to recover herself. "I have had a little since I came into this room, as you may perive," said she presently, with a playful smile, ut it is over now; so let us sit down and be comrtable; for as to scolding you, Fanny, which I me fully intending to do, I have not the heart r it when it comes to the point." And embracg her very affectionately, "Good, gentle anny! when I think of this being the last time seeing you for I do not know how long, I feel quite impossible to do anything but love you." Fanny was affected. She had not foreseen anying of this, and her feelings could seldom withand the melancholy influence of the word "last." e cried as if she had loved Miss Crawford more than she possibly could; and Miss Crawford, yet farther softened by the sight of such emotion, hung about her with fondness, and said, "I hate to leave you. I shall see no one half so amiable where I am going. Who says we shall not be sisters? I know we shall. I feel that we are born to be connected; and those tears convince me that you feel it too, dear Fanny."

[176]

[177]

Fanny roused herself, and replying only in part, said, "But you are only going from one set of friends to another. You are going to a very particular friend."

"Yes, very true. Mrs Fraser has been my intimate friend for years. But I have not the least inclination to go near her. I can think only of the friends I am leaving; my excellent sister, yourself, and the Bertrams in general. You have all so much more heart among you than one finds in the world at large. You all give me a feeling of being able to trust and confide in you, which in common intercourse one knows nothing of. I wish I had settled with Mrs Fraser not to go to her till after Easter, a much better time for the visit, but now I cannot put her off. And when I have done with her, I must go to her sister Lady Stornaway, because she was rather my most particular friend of the two, but I have not cared much for her these three years."

After this speech the two girls sat many min-[178]

tes silent, each thoughtful; Fanny meditating in the different sorts of friendship in the world, Iary on something of less philosophic tendency. he first spoke again.

"How perfectly I remember my resolving to ok for you upstairs, and setting off to find my ay to the East room, without having an idea hereabouts it was! How well I remember what was thinking of as I came along, and my looking in and seeing you here sitting at this table work; and then your cousin's astonishment, hen he opened the door, at seeing me here! o be sure, your uncle's returning that very rening! There never was anything quite like it." Another short fit of abstraction followed, when, making it off, she thus attacked her companion.

"Why, Fanny, you are absolutely in a reverie. hinking, I hope, of one who is always thinking you. Oh! that I could transport you for a ort time into our circle in town, that you might inderstand how your power over Henry is ought of there! Oh! the envyings and heartarnings of dozens and dozens; the wonder, the credulity that will be felt at hearing what you we done! For as to secrecy, Henry is quite the ero of an old romance, and glories in his chains. ou should come to London to know how to timate your conquest. If you were to see how is courted, and how I am courted for his sake!

[179]

Now, I am well aware that I shall not be half so welcome to Mrs Fraser in consequence of his situation with you. When she comes to know the truth she will, very likely, wish me in Northamptonshire again; for there is a daughter of Mr Fraser, by a first wife, whom she is wild to get married, and wants Henry to take. Oh! she has been trying for him to such a degree. Innocent and quiet as you sit here, you cannot have an idea of the sensation that you will be occasioning, of the curiosity there will be to see you, of the endless questions I shall have to answer! Poor Margaret Fraser will be at me for ever about your eyes and your teeth, and how you do your hair, and who makes your shoes. I wish Margaret were married, for my poor friend's sake, for I look upon the Frasers to be about as unhappy as most other married people. And yet it was a most desirable match for Janet at the time. We were all delighted. She could not do otherwise than accept him, for he was rich, and she had nothing; but he turns out ill-tempered and exigeant, and wants a young woman, a beautiful young woman of five-and-twenty, to be as steady as himself. And my friend does not manage him well; she does not seem to know how to make the best of it. There is a spirit of irritation which, to say nothing worse, is certainly very ill-bred. In their house I shall call to mind the [180] onjugal manners of Mansfield Parsonage with espect. Even Dr Grant does show a thorough onfidence in my sister, and a certain consideraon for her judgment, which makes one feel there attachment; but of that I shall see nothing with the Frasers. I shall be at Mansfield for ever, anny. My own sister as a wife, Sir Thomas Bertram as a husband, are my standards of perection. Poor Janet has been sadly taken in, and et there was nothing improper on her side; she id not run into the match inconsiderately; there vas no want of foresight. She took three days o consider of his proposals, and during those hree days asked the advice of everybody conected with her whose opinion was worth having, nd especially applied to my late dear aunt, whose nowledge of the world made her judgment very cenerally and deservedly looked up to by all the oung people of her acquaintance, and she was ecidedly in favour of Mr Fraser. This seems as f nothing were a security for matrimonial comort. I have not so much to say for my friend Flora, who jilted a very nice young man in the Blues for the sake of that horrid Lord Stornavay, who has about as much sense, Fanny, as Mr Rushworth, but much worse looking, and with a lackguard character. I had my doubts at the ime about her being right, for he has not even he air of a gentleman, and now I am sure she was wrong. By-the-bye, Flora Ross was dying for Henry the first winter she came out. Bu were I to attempt to tell you of all the women whom I have known to be in love with him, I should never have done. It is you, only you insensible Fanny, who can think of him with any thing like indifference? But are you so insensibl as you profess yourself? No, no, I see you ar not."

[181]

There was indeed so deep a blush over Fanny' face at that moment, as might warrant strong suspicion in a predisposed mind.

"Excellent creature! I will not teaze you Everything shall take its course. But, dea Fanny, you must allow that you were not s absolutely unprepared to have the question asked as your cousin fancies. It is not possible but that you must have had some thoughts on the subject some surmises as to what might be. You must have seen that he was trying to please you by every attention in his power. Was not he devoted to you at the ball? And then before the ball, the necklace! Oh! you received it just as it was mean You were as conscious as heart could desire. remember it perfectly."

"Do you mean, then, that your brother knew o the necklace beforehand? Oh! Miss Crawford that was not fair."

"Knew of it! It was his own doing entirely [182]

s own thought. I am ashamed to say that it ad never entered my head, but I was delighted act on his proposal for both your sakes."

"I will not say," replied Fanny, "that I was ot half afraid at the time of its being so, for ere was something in your look that frightened e, but not at first; I was as unsuspicious of it first; indeed, indeed I was. It is as true as at I sit here. And had I had an idea of it, othing should have induced me to accept the ecklace. As to your brother's behaviour, cerinly I was sensible of a particularity; I had een sensible of it some little time, perhaps two three weeks, but then I considered it as meang nothing; I put it down as simply being his ay, and was as far from supposing as from ishing him to have any serious thoughts of me. had not, Miss Crawford, been an inattentive oserver of what was passing between him and me part of this family in the summer and aumn. I was quiet, but I was not blind. I could ot but see that Mr Crawford allowed himself gallantries which did mean nothing."

"Ah! I cannot deny it. He has now and then een a sad flirt, and cared very little for the twoc he might be making in young ladies' affecons. I have often scolded him for it, but it is s only fault; and there is this to be said, that ry few young ladies have any affections worth caring for. And then, Fanny, the glory of fixing one who has been shot at by so many; of having it in one's power to pay off the debts of one's sex! Oh! I am sure it is not in woman's nature to refuse such a triumph."

[183]

Fanny shook her head. "I cannot think well of a man who sports with any woman's feelings and there may often be a great deal more suffered than a stander-by can judge of."

"I do not defend him. I leave him entirely to your mercy, and when he has got you at Evering ham I do not care how much you lecture him But this I will say, that his fault, the liking to make girls a little in love with him, is not half so dangerous to a wife's happiness, as a tendency to fall in love himself, which he has never been addicted to. And I do seriously and truly believe that he is attached to you in a way that he never was to any woman before; that he loves you with all his heart, and will love you as nearly for eve as possible. If any man ever loved a woman fo ever, I think Henry will do as much for you."

Fanny could not avoid a faint smile, but has nothing to say.

"I cannot imagine Henry ever to have been happier," continued Mary, presently, "than when he had succeeded in getting your brother's commission."

She had made a sure push at Fanny's feeling here.

[184]

"Oh! yes. How very, very kind of him."

"I know he must have exerted himself very nuch, for I know the parties he had to move. The Admiral hates trouble, and scorns asking "avours; and there are so many young men's claims to be attended to in the same way, that a "riendship and energy, not very determined, is easily put by. What a happy creature William nust be! I wish we could see him."

Poor Fanny's mind was thrown into the most listressing of all its varieties. The recollection of what had been done for William was always he most powerful disturber of every decision gainst Mr Crawford; and she sat thinking leeply of it till Mary, who had been first watchng her complacently, and then musing on somehing else, suddenly called her attention by sayng: "I should like to sit talking with you here ll day, but we must not forget the ladies below, nd so good-bye, my dear, my amiable, my excelent Fanny, for though we shall nominally part n the breakfast parlour, I must take leave of ou here. And I do take leave, longing for a appy re-union, and trusting that when we meet gain it will be under circumstances which may pen our hearts to each other, without any remant or shadow of reserve."

A very, very kind embrace, and some agitation f manner, accompanied these words.

[185]

"I shall see your cousin in town soon: he talk of being there tolerably soon; and Sir Thomas I dare say, in the course of the spring; and you eldest cousin, and the Rushworths, and Julia, am sure of meeting again and again, and all bu you. I have two favours to ask, Fanny: one your correspondence. You must write to me And the other, that you will often call on Mu Grant, and make her amends for my being gone.

The first, at least, of these favours Fann would rather not have been asked; but it wa impossible for her to refuse the correspondence it was impossible for her even not to accede to it more readily than her own judgment author ised. There was no resisting so much apparer affection. Her disposition was peculiarly calculated to value a fond treatment, and from havin hitherto known so little of it, she was the more overcome by Miss Crawford's. Besides, there was gratitude towards her, for having made the tête-à-tête so much less painful than her fear had predicted.

It was over, and she had escaped withour reproaches and without detection. Her secret was still her own; and while that was the cas she thought she could resign herself to almo everything.

In the evening there was another parting Henry Crawford came and sat some time with tem; and her spirits not being previously in the rongest state, her heart was softened for a while wards him, because he really seemed to feel. uite unlike his usual self, he scarcely said anying. He was evidently oppressed, and Fanny ust grieve for him, though hoping she might ever see him again, till he were the husband ' some other woman.

[186]

When it came to the moment of parting, he ould take her hand, he would not be denied it; e said nothing, however, or nothing that she eard, and when he had left the room, she was etter pleased that such a token of friendship ad passed.

On the morrow the Crawfords were gone.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

R CRAWFORD gone, Sir Thomas's next object was, that he should be missed; and he entertained great hope at his niece would find a blank in the loss of ose attentions which at the time she had felt, or ncied an evil. She had tasted of consequence its most flattering form; and he did hope that closs of it, the sinking again into nothing, would raken very wholesome regrets in her mind. He watched her with this idea; but he could hardly tell with what success. He hardly knew whether there were any difference in her spirits or not She was always so gentle and retiring, that her emotions were beyond his discrimination. He did not understand her: he felt that he did not and therefore applied to Edmund to tell him how she stood affected on the present occasion, and whether she were more or less happy than she had been.

[187]

Edmund did not discern any symptoms of regret, and thought his father a little unreasonable in supposing the first three or four days could produce any.

What chiefly surprised Edmund was, that Crawford's sister, the friend and companion, who had been so much to her, should not be more visibly regretted. He wondered that Fanny spoke so seldom of her, and had so little voluntarily to say of her concern at this separation.

Alas! it was this sister, this friend and com panion, who was now the chief bane of Fanny's comfort. If she could have believed Mary's future fate as unconnected with Mansfield as she was determined the brother's should be, if she could have hoped her return thither to be as dis tant as she was much inclined to think his, she would have been light of heart indeed; but the more she recollected and observed, the more eeply was she convinced that everything was ow in a fairer train for Miss Crawford's marving Edmund than it had ever been before. On s side the inclination was stronger, on hers less uivocal. His objections, the scruples of his tegrity, seemed all done away, nobody could Il how, and the doubts and hesitations of her nbition were equally got over; and equally withit apparent reason. It could only be imputed increasing attachment. His good and her bad eelings yielded to love, and such love must unite em. He was to go to town, as soon as some siness relative to Thornton Lacey were comleted, perhaps within a fortnight; he talked of oing, he loved to talk of it; and when once with er again, Fanny could not doubt the rest. Her ceptance must be as certain as his offer; and yet ere were bad feelings still remaining which ade the prospect of it most sorrowful to her, dependently, she believed, independently of lf.

[188]

In their very last conversation, Miss Crawford, spite of some amiable sensations, and much ersonal kindness, had still been Miss Crawford; Il shown a mind led astray and bewildered, and thout any suspicion of being so, darkened, yet neying itself light. She might love, but she d not deserve Edmund by any other sentiment. anny believed there was scarcely a second feeling in common between them; and she may be forgiven by older sages, for looking on the chance of Miss Crawford's future improvement as nearly desperate, for thinking that if Edmund influence in this season of love had already dor so little in clearing her judgment, and regulating her notions, his worth would be finally wasted of her even in years of matrimony.

[189]

Experience might have hoped more for an young people so circumstanced, and impartiality would not have denied to Miss Crawford's nature that participation of the general nature of women which would lead her to adopt the opin ions of the man she loved and respected as h own. But as such were Fanny's persuasions, sl suffered very much from them, and could new speak of Miss Crawford without pain.

Sir Thomas, meanwhile, went on with his ow hopes, and his own observations, still feeling right, by all his knowledge of human nature, expect to see the effect of the loss of power an consequence on his niece's spirits, and the pa attentions of the lover producing a craving f their return; and he was soon afterwards able account for his not yet completely and indub ably seeing all this, by the prospect of anoth visitor, whose approach he could allow to be qui enough to support the spirits he was watchin William had obtained a ten days' leave [190] sence, to be given to Northamptonshire, and as coming, the happiest of lieutenants, because e latest made, to show his happiness and describe s uniform.

He came; and he would have been delighted show his uniform there too, had not cruel cusm prohibited its appearance except on duty. the uniform remained at Portsmouth, and imund conjectured that before Fanny had any ance of seeing it, all its own freshness and all e freshness of its wearer's feelings must be orn away. It would be sunk into a badge of grace; for what can be more unbecoming, or ore worthless, than the uniform of a lieutenant, no has been a lieutenant a year or two and es others made commanders before him? So asoned Edmund, till his father made him the onfidant] of a scheme which placed Fanny's ance of seeing the second lieutenant of H.M. Thrush in all his glory in another light.

This scheme was that she should accompany r brother back to Portsmouth, and spend a little ne with her own family. It had occurred to r Thomas, in one of his dignified musings, as right and desirable measure; but before he solutely made up his mind, he consulted his son. Imund considered it every way, and saw nothg but was right. The thing was good in itself, d could not be done at a better time; and he had no doubt of it being highly agreeable t Fanny. This was enough to determine Si Thomas; and a decisive "then so it shall be" close that stage of the business; Sir Thomas retirin from it with some feelings of satisfaction, an views of good over and above what he had con municated to his son; for his prime motive i sending her away had very little to do with the propriety of her seeing her parents again, an nothing at all with any idea of making he happy. He certainly wished her to go willing but he as certainly wished her to be heartily sid of home before her visit ended; and that a litt abstinence from the elegancies and luxuries of Mansfield Park would bring her mind into a sob state, and incline her to a juster estimate of the value of that home of greater permanence, an equal comfort, of which she had the offer.

[191]

It was a medicinal project upon his niece understanding which he must consider as at preent diseased. A residence of eight or nine yea in the abode of wealth and plenty had a litt disordered her powers of comparing and judgin Her father's house would, in all probability, tea her the value of a good income; and he trust that she would be the wiser and happier woma all her life, for the experiment he had devised.

Had Fanny been at all addicted to raptur she must have had a strong attack of them wh

[192]

he first understood what was intended, when her ncle first made her the offer of visiting the parnts, and brothers, and sisters, from whom she ad been divided, almost half her life; of returnng for a couple of months to the scenes of her fancy, with William for the protector and ompanion of her journey, and the certainty of ontinuing to see William to the last hour of his emaining on land. Had she ever given way to ursts of delight, it must have been then, for ne was delighted, but her happiness was of a uiet, deep, heart-swelling sort, and though never great talker, she was always more inclined to lence when feeling most strongly. At the oment she could only thank and accept. Afterards, when familiarised with the visions of joyment so suddenly opened, she could speak ore largely to William and Edmund of what e felt; but still there were emotions of tenderess that could not be clothed in words. The membrance of all her earliest pleasures, and what she had suffered in being torn from them, me over her with renewed strength, and it emed as if to be at home again would heal every in that had since grown out of the separation. be in the centre of such a circle, loved by so any, and more loved by all than she had ever en before; to feel affection without fear or straint: to feel herself the equal of those who surrounded her; to be at peace from all mentio of the Crawfords, safe from every look whic could be fancied a reproach on their accoun This was a prospect to be dwelt on with a fond ness that could be but half acknowledged.

[193]

Edmund, too—to be two months from him, and perhaps, she might be allowed to make he absence three, must do her good. At a distance unassailed by his looks or his kindness, and sat from the perpetual irritation of knowing h heart, and striving to avoid his confidence, she should be able to reason herself into a properstate; she should be able to think of him as in Lon don, and arranging everything there, without wretchedness. What might have been hard bear at Mansfield was to become a slight evil Portsmouth.

The only drawback was the doubt of her au Bertram's being comfortable without her. SI was of use to no one else; but there she might is missed to a degree that she did not like to thin of; and that part of the arrangement was, indee the hardest for Sir Thomas to accomplish, an what only he could have accomplished at all.

But he was master at Mansfield Park. Wh he had really resolved on any measure, he cou always carry it through; and now by dint of lor talking on the subject, explaining and dwellin on the duty of Fanny's sometimes seeing h [194] mily, he did induce his wife to let her go; taining it rather from submission, however, an conviction, for Lady Bertram was conneed of very little more than that Sir Thomas ought Fanny ought to go, and therefore that e must. In the calmness of her own dressingom, in the impartial flow of her own meditaons, unbiassed by his bewildering statements, e could not acknowledge any necessity for anny's ever going near a father and mother no had done without her so long, while she was useful to herself. And as to the not missing r, which under Mrs Norris's discussion was the int attempted to be proved, she set herself very eadily against admitting any such thing.

Sir Thomas had appealed to her reason, ccnence, and dignity. He called it a sacrifice, and manded it of her goodness and self-command such. But Mrs Norris wanted to persuade her at Fanny could be very well spared (she being ady to give up all her own time to her as reested) and in short, could not really be wanted missed.

"That may be, sister," was all Lady Bertram's oly. "I dare say you are very right; but I am re I shall miss her very much."

The next step was to communicate with Portsuth. Fanny wrote to offer herself; and her ther's answer, though short, was so kind—a few simple lines expressed so natural and mot erly a joy in the prospect of seeing her chil again, as to confirm all the daughter's views of happiness in being with her-convincing her that she should now find a warm and affectionation friend in the "mamma" who had certainly show no remarkable fondness for her formerly; bu this she could easily suppose to have been her ow fault or her own fancy. She had probably alien ated love by the helplessness and fretfulness of a fearful temper, or been unreasonable in wan ing a larger share than any one among so man could deserve. Now, when she knew better ho to be useful, and how to forbear, and when h mother could be no longer occupied by the ince sant demands of a house full of little childre there would be leisure and inclination for even comfort, and they should soon be what moth and daughter ought to be to each other.

[195]

William was almost as happy in the plan as h sister. It would be the greatest pleasure to hi to have her there to the last moment before I sailed, and perhaps find her there still when I came in from his first cruise. And besides, I wanted her so very much to see the Thrush befo she went out of harbour (the Thrush was ce tainly the finest sloop in the service); and the were several improvements in the dock-yard, to which he quite longed to show her.

[196]

He did not scruple to add, that her being at ome for a while would be a great advantage to verybody.

"I do not know how it is," said he; "but we seem want some of your nice ways and orderliness my father's. The house is always in confusion. ou will see things going in a better way, I am re. You will tell my mother how it all ought be, and you will be so useful to Susan, and you ill teach Betsey, and make the boys love and ind you. How right and comfortable it will all ?"

By the time Mrs Price's answer arrived, there mained but a very few days more to be spent Mansfield; and for part of one of those days, e young travellers were in a good deal of alarm the subject of their journey, for when the ode of it came to be talked of, and Mrs Norris und that all her anxiety to save her brother-inw's money was vain, and that in spite of her shes and hints for a less expensive conveyance Fanny, they were to travel post; when she saw r Thomas actually give William notes for the rpose, she was struck with the idea of there ing room for a third in the carriage, and sudnly seized with a strong inclination to go with em, to go and see her poor dear sister Price. e proclaimed her thoughts. She must say that e had more than half a mind to go with the young people; it would be such an indulgence her; she had not seen her poor dear sister Pri for more than twenty years; and it would be help to the young people in their journey to ha her older head to manage for them; and she cou not help thinking her poor dear sister Price wou feel it very unkind of her not to come by su an opportunity.

[197]

William and Fanny were horror-struck at t idea.

All the comfort of their comfortable journ would be destroyed at once. With woeful coutenances they looked at each other. Their supense lasted an hour or two. No one interfer to encourage or dissuade. Mrs Norris was let to settle the matter by herself; and it ended, the infinite joy of her nephew and niece, in t recollection that she could not possibly be spar from Mansfield Park at present; that she was great deal too necessary to Sir Thomas and La Bertram for her to be able to answer it to herse to leave them even for a week, and, therefor must certainly sacrifice every other pleasure that of being useful to them.

It had, in fact, occurred to her, that thou taken to Portsmouth for nothing, it would hardly possible for her to avoid paying her ov expenses back again. So her poor dear sis Price was left to all the disappointment of h issing such an opportunity, and another twenty ears' absence, perhaps, begun.

[198]

Edmund's plans were affected by this Portsouth journey, this absence of Fanny's. He, too, ad a sacrifice to make to Mansfield Park as well his aunt. He had intended, about this time, to going to London; but he could not leave his ther and mother just when everybody else of ost importance to their comfort was leaving em; and with an effort, felt but not boasted of, delayed for a week or two longer a journey nich he was looking forward to with the hope its fixing his happiness for ever.

He told Fanny of it. She knew so much ceady, that she must know everything. It made e substance of one other confidential discourse out Miss Crawford; and Fanny was the more fected from feeling it to be the last time in nich Miss Crawford's name would ever be menned between them with any remains of liberty. ce afterwards she was alluded to by him. Lady rtram had been telling her niece in the evening write to her soon and often, and promising to a good correspondent herself; and Edmund, a convenient moment, then added in a whisper, nd I shall write to you, Fanny, when I have thing worth writing about, anything to say t I think you will like to hear, and that you will ; hear so soon from any other quarter." Had she doubted his meaning while she listened, th glow in his face, when she looked up at him, would have been decisive.

[199]

For this letter she must try to arm herself That a letter from Edmund should be a sub ject of terror! She began to feel that sh had not yet gone through all the change of opinion and sentiment which the progress of time and variation of circumstances occa sion in this world of changes. The vicissitude of the human mind had not yet been exhausted by her.

Poor Fanny! though going as she did willingly and eagerly, the last evening at Mansfield Park must still be wretchedness. Her heart was completely sad at parting. She had tears for every room in the house, much more for every beloved inhabitant. She clung to her aunt, because she would miss her; she kissed the hand of her uncle with struggling sobs, because she had displeased him; and as for Edmund, she could neither speak nor look, nor think, when the last moment came with him; and it was not till it was over that she knew he was giving her the affectionate farewell of a brother.

All this passed over night, for the journey was to begin very early in the morning; and when the small, diminished party met at breakfast, William and Fanny were talked of as already advanced one stage.

[200]

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

HE novelty of travelling, and the happiness of being with William, soon produced their natural effect on Fanny's rits, when Mansfield Park was fairly left ind; and by the time their first stage was led, and they were to quit Sir Thomas's carge, she was able to take leave of the old coachn, and send back proper messages, with cheerlooks.

Of pleasant talk between the brother and sisthere was no end. Everything supplied an usement to the high glee of William's mind, he was full of frolic and joke in the intervals their higher-toned subjects, all of which ended, they did not begin, in praise of the Thrush, jectures how she would be employed, schemes an action with some superior force, which posing the first lieutenant out of the way, d William was not very merciful to the first itenant) was to give himself the next step as on as possible, or speculations upon prizeney, which was to be generously distributed at me, with only the reservation of enough tc ke the little cottage comfortable, in which he d Fanny were to pass all their middle and later e together.

Fanny's immediate concerns, as far as the involved Mr Crawford, made no part of their conversation. William knew what had passed and from his heart lamented that his sister's feelings should be so cold towards a man whom h must consider as the first of human characters but he was of an age to be all for love, and there fore unable to blame; and knowing her wish of the subject, he would not distress her by the slightest allusion.

She had reason to suppose herself not yet for gotten by Mr Crawford. She had heard repeat edly from his sister within the three weeks which had passed since their leaving Mansfield, and i each letter there had been a few lines from him self, warm and determined like his speeches. I was a correspondence which Fanny found quit as unpleasant as she had feared. Miss Crawford' style of writing, lively and affectionate, was itsel an evil, independent of what she was thus force into reading from the brother's pen, for Edmun would never rest till she had read the chief of th letter to him; and then she had to listen to hi admiration of her language, and the warmth o her attachments. There had, in fact, been so much of message, of allusion, of recollection, so much of Mansfield in every letter, that Fanny could not but suppose it meant for him to hear; and to find herself forced into a purpose of that kind [202] npelled into a correspondence which was bringg her the addresses of the man she did not love, d obliging her to administer to the adverse pasn of the man she did, was cruelly mortifying. ere, too, her present removal promised advange. When no longer under the same roof with lmund, she trusted that Miss Crawford would we no motive for writing strong enough to overme the trouble, and that at Portsmouth their rrespondence would dwindle into nothing.

With such thoughts as these, among ten huned others, Fanny proceeded in her journey fely and cheerfully, and as expeditiously as uld rationally be hoped in the dirty month of bruary. They entered Oxford, but she could ke only a hasty glimpse of Edmund's college as ey passed along, and made no stop anywhere, I they reached Newbury, where a comfortable eal uniting dinner and supper, wound up the joyments and fatigues of the day.

The next morning saw them off again at an rly hour; and with no events, and no delays, ey regularly advanced, and were in the environs Portsmouth while there was yet daylight for anny to look around her, and wonder at the w buildings. They passed the drawbridge, and tered the town; and the light was only beginng to fail, as, guided by William's powerful ice, they were rattled into a narrow street, leading from the High Street, and drawn up before the door of a small house now inhabited by Mr Price.

[203]

Fanny was all agitation and flutter; all hope and apprehension. The moment they stopped a trollopy-looking maid-servant, seemingly in waiting for them at the door, stepped forward and more intent on telling the news than giving them any help, immediately began with "The Thrush is gone out of harbour, please sir, and one of the officers has been here to-" She was interrupted by a fine tall boy of eleven years old, who rushing out of the house, pushed the maid aside and while William was opening the chaise-door himself, called out, "You are just in time. We have been looking for you this half hour. The Thrush went out of harbour this morning. I saw her. It was a beautiful sight. And they think she will have her orders in a day or two. And Mr Campbell was here at four o'clock to ask for you: he has got one of the Thrush's boats, and is going off to her at six, and hoped you would be here in time to go with him."

A stare or two at Fanny, as William helped her out of the carriage, was all the voluntary notice which this brother bestowed: but he made no objection to her kissing him, though still entirely engaged in detailing farther particulars of the Thrush's going out of harbour, in which he [204] a strong right of interest, being to comnce his career of seamanship in her at this very e.

Another moment and Fanny was in the narrow rance-passage of the house, and in her moths arms, who met her there with looks of true dness, and with features which Fanny loved more, because they brought her aunt Berm's before her; and there were her two sisters, san, a well-grown fine girl of fourteen, and tsey, the youngest of the family, about five h glad to see her in their way, though with no vantage of manner in receiving her. But manr Fanny did not want. Would they but love t, she should be satisfied.

She was then taken into a parlour, so small that first conviction was of its being only a pasge-room to something better, and she stood for moment expecting to be invited on; but when e saw there was no other door, and that there re signs of habitation before her, she called ek her thoughts, reproved herself, and grieved t they should have been suspected. Her mother, wever, could not stay long enough to suspect ything. She was gone again to the street-door, welcome William. "Oh! my dear William, how ad I am to see you. But have you heard about e Thrush? She is gone out of the harbour ready; three days before we had any thought of it; and I do not know what I am to do about Sam's things, they will never be ready in time for she may have her orders to-morrow, perhaps It takes me quite unawares. And now you must be off for Spithead too. Campbell has been here quite in a worry about you; and now what sha we do? I thought to have had such a comfortable evening with you, and here everything come upon me at once."

[205]

Her son answered cheerfully, telling her that everything was always for the best; and making light of his own inconvenience, in being obliged to hurry away so soon.

"To be sure, I had much rather she had stayed in harbour, that I might have sat a few hours wit you in comfort; but as there is a boat ashore, had better go off at once, and there is no help fo it. Whereabouts does the Thrush lay at Spit head? Near the Canopus? But no matter; here? Fanny in the parlour, and why should we stay in the passage? Come, mother, you have hard! looked at your own dear Fanny yet."

In they both came, and Mrs Price having kindly kissed her daughter again, and commented a little on her growth, began with very natura solicitude to feel for their fatigues and wants a travellers.

"Poor dears! how tired you must both be! and now, what will you have? I began to think you [206] uld never come. Betsey and I have been watchfor you this half hour. And when did you anything to eat? And what would you like have now? I could not tell whether you would for some meat, or only a dish of tea after your urney, or else I would have got something dy. And now I am afraid Campbell will be before there is time to dress a steak, and we we no butcher at hand. It is very inconvenient have no butcher in the street. We were better in our last house. Perhaps you would like me tea as soon as it can be got."

They both declared they should prefer it to ything. "Then, Betsey, my dear, run into the chen, and see if Rebecca has put the water on; I tell her to bring in the tea-things as soon as a can. I wish we could get the bell mended; t Betsey is a very handy little messenger."

Betsey went with alacrity, proud to show her lities before her fine new sister.

"Dear me!" continued the anxious mother, hat a sad fire we have got, and I dare say you both starved with cold. Draw your chair arer, my dear. I cannot think what Rebecca been about. I am sure I told her to bring me coals half an hour ago. Susan, you should we taken care of the fire."

'I was upstairs, mamma, moving my things," d Susan, in a fearless, self-defending tone, which startled Fanny. "You know you had but just settled that my sister Fanny and I should have the other room; and I could not get Rebecca to give me any help."

[207]

Farther discussion was prevented by various bustles; first, the driver came to be paid; then there was a squabble between Sam and Rebecca about the manner of carrying up his sister's trunk, which he would manage all his own way; and lastly in walked Mr Price himself, his own loud voice preceding him, as with something of the oath kind he kicked away his son's portmanteau and his daughter's band-box in the passage, and called out for a candle; no candle was brought, however, and he walked into the room.

Fanny with doubting feelings had risen to meet him, but sank down again on finding herself undistinguished in the dusk, and unthought of. With a friendly shake of his son's hand, and an eager voice, he instantly began—"Ha! welcome back, my boy. Glad to see you. Have you heard the news? The Thrush went out of the harbour this morning. Sharp is the word, you see! By G—, you are just in time! The doctor has been here inquiring for you: he has got one of the boats, and is to be off for Spithead by six, so you had better go with him. I have been to Turner's about your mess; it is all in a way to be done. I should not wonder if you had your orders to-[208] rrow: but you cannot sail with this wind, if are to cruize to the westward; and Captain alsh thinks you will certainly have a cruize to westward, with the Elephant. By G-, I h you may! But old Scholey was saying, just v, that he thought you would be sent first to Texel. Well, well, we are ready, whatever opens. But by G-, you lost a fine sight by not ng here in the morning to see the Thrush go of harbour! I would not have been out of way for a thousand pounds. Old Scholey ran at breakfast-time, to say she had slipped her orings and was coming out, I jumped up, and de but two steps to the platform. If ever re was a perfect beauty afloat, she is one; and re she lays at Spithead, and anybody in Engd would take her for an eight-and-twenty. I s upon the platform two hours this afternoon king at her. She lays close to the Endymion, ween her and the Cleopatra, just to the eastrd of the sheer hulk."

"Ha!" cried William, "that's just where I ould have put her myself. It's the best berth at ithead. But here is my sister, sir; here is nny," turning and leading her forward; "it is dark you do not see her."

With an acknowledgment that he had quite got her, Mr Price now received his daughter; I having given her a cordial hug, and observed that she was grown into a woman, and he sup posed would be wanting a husband soon, seemed very much inclined to forget her again.

[209]

Fanny shrunk back to her seat, with feelings sadly pained by his language and his smell of spirits; and he talked on only to his son, and only of the Thrush, though William, warmly interested as he was, in that subject, more than once tried to make his father think of Fanny, and her long absence and long journey.

After sitting some time longer, a candle was obtained; but as there was still no appearance of tea, nor, from Betsey's reports from the kitchen much hope of any under a considerable period. William determined to go and change his dress and make the necessary preparations for his removal on board directly, that he might have his tea in comfort afterwards.

As he left the room, two rosy-faced boys, ragged and dirty, about eight and nine years old, rushed into it just released from school, and coming eagerly to see their sister, and tell that the Thrush was gone out of harbour; Tom and Charles. Charles had been born since Fanny's going away, but Tom she had often helped to nurse, and now felt a particular pleasure in seeing again. Both were kissed very tenderly, but Tom she wanted to keep by her, to try to trace the features of the baby she had loved, and talked of his infant preference of herself. Tom, vever, had no mind for such treatment: he he home not to stand and be talked to, but to about and make a noise; and both boys had h burst from her, and slammed the parlour r till her temples ached.

[210]

she had now seen all that were at home; there ained only two brothers between herself and an, one of whom was a clerk in a public office London, and the other midshipman on board Indiaman. But though she had seen all the mbers of the family, she had not yet heard all noise they could make. Another quarter of an r brought her a great deal more. William was n calling out, from the landing-place of the ond story, for his mother and for Rebecca. He in distress for something that he had left re, and did not find again. A key was mis-, Betsey accused of having got at his new hat, some slight, but essential alteration of his form waistcoat, which he had been promised ave done for him, entirely neglected.

Irs Price, Rebecca, and Betsey, all went up defend themselves, all talking together, but becca loudest, and the job was to be done, as l as it could, in a great hurry; William trying rain to send Betsey down again, or keep her m being troublesome where she was; the whole which, as almost every door in the house was open, could be plainly distinguished in the parlour, except when drowned at intervals by the superior noise of Sam, Tom, and Charles chasing each other up and down stairs, and tumbling about and hallooing.

[211]

Fanny was almost stunned. The smallness of the house and thinness of the walls brought everything so close to her, that, added to the fatigue of her journey, and all her recent agitation, she hardly knew how to bear it. Within the room all was tranquil enough, for Susan having disappeared with the others, there were soon only her father and herself remaining; and he taking out a newspaper, the accustomary loan of a neighbour, applied himself to studying it, without seeming to recollect her existence. The solitary candle was held between himself and the paper, without any reference to her possible convenience; but she had nothing to do, and was glad to have the light screened from her aching head, as she sat in bewildered, broken, sorrowful contemplation.

She was at home. But, alas! it was not such a home, she had not such a welcome, as—she checked herself; she was unreasonable. What right had she to be of importance to her family? She could have none, so long lost sight of! William's concerns must be dearest, they always had been, and he had every right. Yet to have so e said or asked about herself, to have scarcely inquiry made after Mansfield! It did pain to have Mansfield forgotten; the friends who done so much; the dear, dear friends! But e, one subject swallowed up all the rest. Pers it must be so. The destination of the Thrush st be now pre-eminently interesting. A day two might show the difference. She only was blame. Yet she thought it would not have been at Mansfield. No, in her uncle's house there ald have been a consideration of times and seas, a regulation of subject, a propriety, an ention towards every body which there was here.

[212]

The only interruption which thoughts like these eived for nearly half an hour was from a sudburst of her father's, not at all calculated to apose them. At a more than ordinary pitch of mping and hallooing in the passage, he exmed, "Devil take those young dogs! How y are singing out! Ay, Sam's voice louder than the rest! That boy is fit for a boatswain. Holyou there! Sam, stop your confounded pipe, I shall be after you."

This threat was so palpably disregarded, that ugh within five minutes afterwards the three is all burst into the room together and sat wh, Fanny could not consider it as a proof anything more than their being for the time thoroughly fagged, which their hot faces and panting breaths seemed to prove, especially a they were still kicking each other's shins, and hallooing out at sudden starts immediately under their father's eyes.

[213]

The next opening of the door brought some thing more welcome; it was for the tea-things which she had begun almost to despair of seeing that evening. Susan and an attendant girl, whos inferior appearance informed Fanny, to he great surprise, that she had previously seen th upper servant, brought in everything necessar for the meal; Susan looking, as she put the kettl on the fire and glanced at her sister, as if divide between the agreeable triumph of showing he activity and usefulness, and the dread of bein thought to demean herself by such an office "She had been into the kitchen," she said, "t hurry Sally and help make the toast, and sprea the bread and butter, or she did not know whe they should have got tea, and she was sure he sister must want something after her journey.

Fanny was very thankful. She could not bu own that she should be very glad of a little ter and Susan immediately set about making it, a if pleased to have the employment all to herself and with only a little unnecessary bustle, an some few injudicious attempts at keeping he brothers in better order than she could, acquitte self very well. Fanny's spirit was as much reshed as her body; her head and heart were in the better for such well-timed kindness. San had an open, sensible countenance; she is like William, and Fanny hoped to find her is him in disposition and good will towards self.

[214]

n this more placid state of things William entered, followed not far behind by his mother Betsey. He, complete in his lieutenant's unim, looking and moving all the taller, firmer, more graceful for it, and with the happiest le over his face, walked up directly to Fanny, o, rising from her seat, looked at him for a ment in speechless admiration, and then threw arms round his neck to sob out her various otions of pain and pleasure.

Anxious not to appear unhappy, she soon overed herself; and wiping away her tears, a able to notice and admire all the striking ts of his dress; listening with reviving spirits his cheerful hopes of being on shore some part every day before they sailed, and even of ting her to Spithead to see the sloop.

The next bustle brought in Mr Campbell, the geon of the Thrush, a very well behaved ng man, who came to call for his friend, and whom there was with some contrivance nd a chair, and with some hasty washing of the young tea-maker's, a cup and saucer; an after another quarter of an hour of earnest ta between the gentlemen, noise rising upon nois and bustle upon bustle, men and boys at la all in motion together, the moment came for se ting off; everything was ready, William too leave, and all of them were gone; for the three boys, in spite of their mother' intreaty, deter mined to see their brother and Mr Campbell of the sally-port; and Mr Price walked off at the same time to carry back his neighbour's news paper.

[215]

Something like tranquillity might now h hoped for; and accordingly, when Rebecca ha been prevailed on to carry away the tea-thing and Mrs Price had walked about the room som time looking for a shirt-sleeve, which Betsey a last hunted out from a drawer in the kitchen, th small party of females were pretty well com posed, and the mother having lamented agai over the impossibility of getting Sam ready i time, was at leisure to think of her eldest daugh ter and the friends she had come from.

A few enquiries began: but one of the earlies —How did sister Bertram manage about her ser vants? Was she as much plagued as herself t get tolerable servants?—soon led her mind away from Northamptonshire, and fixed it on her own domestic grievances, and the shocking characte [216]

He, complete in his lieutenant's uniform, and all the taller and more graceful for it

Il the Portsmouth servants, of whom she beed her own two were the very worst, engrossed completely. The Bertrams were all forgotin detailing the faults of Rebecca, against m Susan had also much to depose, and little sey a great deal more, and who did seem so oughly without a single recommendation, Fanny could not help modestly presuming her mother meant to part with her when her was up.

Her year!" cried Mrs Price; "I am sure I e I shall be rid of her before she has staid ear, for that will not be up till November. vants are come to such a pass, my dear, in tsmouth, that it is quite a miracle if one keeps in more than half-a-year. I have no hope of being settled; and if I was to part with Reea, I should only get something worse. And I do not think I am a very difficult mistress lease; and I am sure the place is easy enough, there is always a girl under her, and I often alf the work myself."

anny was silent; but not from being convinced there might not be a remedy found for some hese evils. As she now sat looking at Betsey, could not but think particularly of another r, a very pretty little girl, whom she had left e not much younger when she went into thamptonshire, who had died a few years afterwards. There had been something remar ably amiable about her. Fanny in those ear days had preferred her to Susan; and when the news of her death had at last reached Mansfiel had for a short time been quite afflicted. The sight of Betsey brought the image of little Man back again, but she would not have pained her mother by alluding to her for the world. Whi considering her with these ideas, Betsey, at small distance, was holding out something catch her eyes, meaning to screen it at the san time from Susan's.

[217]

"What have you got there, my love?" sa Fanny, "come and shew it to me."

It was a silver knife. Up jumped Susa claiming it as her own, and trying to get it away but the child ran to her mother's protection, ar Susan could only reproach, which she did ver warmly, and evidently hoping to interest Fam on her side. "It was very hard that she was n to have her own knife; it was her own knife; li tle sister Mary had left it to her upon her deat bed, and she ought to have had it to keep herse long ago. But mamma kept it from her, and w always letting Betsey get hold of it; and the er of it would be that Betsey would spoil it, and g it for her own, though mamma had promised h that Betsey should not have it in her own hands r, honour, and tenderness, was wounded by sister's speech and her mother's reply.

Fanny was quite shocked. Every feeling [218]

Now, Susan," cried Mrs Price in a complainvoice, "now, how can you be so cross? You always quarrelling about that knife. I wish would not be so quarrelsome. Poor little Bethow cross Susan is to you! But you should have taken it out, my dear, when I sent you e drawer. You know I told you not to touch ecause Susan is so cross about it. I must it another time, Betsey. Poor Mary little ght it would be such a bone of contention n she gave it me to keep, only two hours beshe died. Poor little soul! she could but just k to be heard, and she said so prettily, 'Let r Susan have my knife, mamma, when I am and buried.' Poor little dear! she was so l of it, Fanny, that she would have it lay by n bed, all through her illness. It was the gift er good godmother, old Mrs Admiral Maxonly six weeks before she was taken for h. Poor little sweet creature! Well, she was n away from evil to come. My own Betsey dling her), you have not the luck of such a godmother. Aunt Norris lives too far off ink of such little people as you."

inny had indeed nothing to convey from aunt ris, but a message to say she hoped that her aughter was a good girl, and learnt her book. There had been at one moment a slight murmur in the drawing-room at Mansfield Park about sending her a prayer-book; but no second sound had been heard of such a purpose. Mr Norris, however, had gone home and taken down two old prayer-books of her husband with that idea; but, upon examination, the ardour of gen erosity went off. One was found to have too small a print for a child's eyes, and the other to be too cumbersome for her to carry about.

[219]

Fanny, fatigued and fatigued again, wa thankful to accept the first invitation of going to bed; and before Betsey had finished her cry at being allowed to sit up only one hour extra ordinary in honour of sister, she was off, leaving all below in confusion and noise again; the boy begging for toasted cheese, her father calling ou for his rum and water, and Rebecca never where she ought to be.

There was nothing to raise her spirits in the confined and scantily-furnished chamber that she was to share with Susan. The smallness of the rooms above and below, indeed, and the narrowness of the passage and staircase, struck her beyond her imagination. She soon learned to think with respect of her own little attic at Mansfield Park, in that house reckoned too small for anybody's comfort.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

NOULD Sir Thomas have seen all his niece's feelings, when she wrote her first letter . to her aunt, he would not have despaired; though a good night's rest, a pleasant mornthe hope of soon seeing William again, and comparatively quiet state of the house, from n and Charles being gone to school, Sam on e project of his own, and her father on his al lounges, enabled her to express herself rfully on the subject of home, there were , to her own perfect consciousness, many wbacks suppressed. Could he have seen only ' that she felt before the end of a week, he ld have thought Mr Crawford sure of her, been delighted with his own sagacity.

efore the week ended, it was all disappointt. In the first place, William was gone. The ush had had her orders, the wind had changed, he was sailed within four days from their hing Portsmouth; and during those days she seen him only twice; in a short and hurried , when he had come ashore on duty. There been no free conversation, no walk on the parts, no visit to the dock-yard, no acquaintwith the Thrush, nothing of all that they had ned and depended on. Everything in that quarter failed her, except William's affective His last thought on leaving home was for her He stepped back again to the door to say, "Ta care of Fanny, mother. She is tender, and re used to rough it like the rest of us. I charge ye take care of Fanny."

[221]

William was gone: and the home he had l her in was, Fanny could not conceal it from h self, in almost every respect the very reverse what she could have wished. It was the abode noise, disorder, and impropriety. Nobody was their right place, nothing was done as it oug to be. She could not respect her parents as s had hoped. On her father, her confidence had r been sanguine, but he was more negligent of l family, his habits were worse, and his manne coarser, than she had been prepared for. He d not want abilities; but he had no curiosity, an no information beyond his profession; he reonly the newspaper and the navy-list; he talk only of the dock-yard, the harbour, Spithead, an the Motherbank; he swore and drank, he w dirty and gross. She had never been able recall anything approaching to tenderness in h former treatment of herself. There had r mained only a general impression of roughne and loudness; and now he scarcely ever notice her, but to make her the object of a coarse joke she had hoped much, and found almost noth-Every flattering scheme of being of consece to her soon fell to the ground. Mrs Price not unkind; but, instead of gaining on her ction and confidence, and becoming more and e dear, her daughter never met with greater ness from her than on the first day of her al. The instinct of nature was soon satisfied, Mrs Price's attachment had no other source. heart and her time were already quite full; ad neither leisure nor affection to bestow on ny. Her daughters never had been much to She was fond of her sons, especially of Wil-, but Betsey was the first of her girls whom had ever much regarded. To her she was injudiciously indulgent. William was her e; Betsey her darling; and John, Richard, , Tom, and Charles, occupied all the rest of maternal solicitude, alternately her worries her comforts. These shared her heart: her was given chiefly to her house and her sers. Her days were spent in a kind of slow e; all was busy without getting on, always nd hand and lamenting it, without altering ways; wishing to be an economist, without vivance or regularity; dissatisfied with her ints, without skill to make them better, and her helping or reprimanding, or indulging , without any power of engaging their ect.

Her disappointment in her mother was greate [222]

Of her two sisters, Mrs Price very much mo resembled Lady Bertram than Mrs Norris. SI was a manager by necessity, without any of M Norris's inclination for it, or any of her activit Her disposition was naturally easy and indoler like Lady Bertram's; and a situation of simil affluence and do-nothingness would have bee much more suited to her capacity than the exe tions and self-denials of the one which her in prudent marriage had placed her in. She mig have made just as good a woman of consequen as Lady Bertram's, but Mrs Norris would have been a more respectable mother of nine childre on a small income.

Much of all this Fanny could not but be se sible of. She might scruple to make use of t words, but she must and did feel that her moth was a partial, ill-judging parent, a dawdle, slattern, who neither taught nor restrained h children, whose house was the scene of misma agement and discomfort from beginning to en and who had no talent, no conversation, no affection towards herself; no curiosity to know h better, no desire of her friendship, and no incliation for her company that could lessen her sen of such feelings.

Fanny was very anxious to be useful, and n to appear above her home, or in way disqualifi or disinclined, by her foreign education, fro [224] ributing her help to its comforts, and thereset about working for Sam immediately, and vorking early and late, with perseverance and at dispatch, did so much that the boy was ped off at last, with more than half his linen y. She had great pleasure in feeling her useess, but could not conceive how they would a managed without her.

m, loud and overbearing as he was, she rather etted when he went, for he was clever and ligent, and glad to be employed in any nd in the town; and though spurning the onstrances of Susan, given as they were, gh very reasonable in themselves, with illd and powerless warmth, was beginning to be enced by Fanny's services and gentle perions; and she found that the best of the three nger ones was gone in him; Tom and Charles g at least as many years as they were his jundistant from that age of feeling and reason, h might suggest the expediency of making nds, and of endeavouring to be less disagree-Their sister soon despaired of making the lest impression on them; they were quite meable by any means of address which she spirits or time to attempt. Every afternoon ght a return of their riotous games all over nouse; and she very early learned to sigh at pproach of Saturday's constant half holiday.

[225]

Betsey, too, a spoiled child, trained up to the the alphabet her greatest enemy, left to be we the servants at her pleasure, and then encourant to report any evil of them, she was almost ready to despair of being able to love or ass and of Susan's temper she had many dou Her continual disagreements with her moth her rash squabbles with Tom and Charles, a petulance with Betsey, were at least so distress to Fanny, that though admitting they were no means without provocation, she feared the position that could push them to such length m be far from amiable, and from affording a repose to herself.

Such was the home which was to put Mansfi out of her head, and teach her to think of cousin Edmund with moderated feelings. the contrary, she could think of nothing Mansfield, its beloved inmates, its happy wa Everything where she now was was in full e trast to it. The elegance, propriety, regular harmony, and perhaps, above all, the peace a tranquillity of Mansfield, were brought to remembrance every hour of the day, by the pr alence of everything opposite to them here.

The living in incessant noise was, to a fra and temper delicate and nervous like Fanny's, evil which no superadded elegance or harmo could have entirely atoned for. It was the gree [226] nisery of all. At Mansfield, no sounds of ention, no raised voice, no abrupt bursts, no d of violence, was ever heard; all proceeded regular course of cheerful orderliness; everyv had their due importance; everybody's feelwere consulted. If tenderness could be ever oosed wanting, good sense and good breeding blied its place; and as to the little irritations, etimes introduced by aunt Norris, they were t, they were trifling, they were as a drop of r to the ocean, compared with the ceaseless ilt of her present abode. Here, everybody noisy, every voice was loud (excepting, per-, her mother's, which resembled the soft otony of Lady Bertram's, only worn into fulness). Whatever was wanted was halloo'd and the servants halloo'd out their excuses the kitchen. The doors were in constant ring, the stairs were never at rest, nothing done without a clatter, nobody sat still, and dy could command attention when they e.

a review of the two houses, as they appeared er before the end of a week, Fanny was oted to apply to them Dr Johnson's celeed judgment as to matrimony and celibacy, say, that though Mansfield Park might have pains, Portsmouth could have no pleasures.

CHAPTER XL.

ANNY was right enough in not expec to hear from Miss Crawford now, at rapid rate in which their corresponde had begun; Mary's next letter was after a de edly longer interval than the last, but she not right in supposing that such an inte would be felt a great relief to herself. Here another strange revolution of mind! She really glad to receive the letter when it did co In her present exile from good society, and tance from everything that had been wont interest her, a letter from one belonging to set where her heart lived, written with affect and some degree of elegance, was thoroug acceptable. The usual plea of increasing enga ments was made in excuse for not having writ to her earlier; "and now that I have begun," continued, "my letter will not be worth your re ing, for there will be no little offering of love the end, no three or four lines passionnées fr the most devoted H. C. in the world, for Henr in Norfolk; business called him to Everingh ten days ago, or perhaps he only pretended call, for the sake of being travelling at the sa time that you were. But there he is, and, by bye, his absence may sufficiently account for a [228] ssness of his sister's in writing, for there has no 'Well, Mary, when do you write to ny? Is not it time for you to write to ny?' to spur me on. At last, after various npts at meeting, I have seen your cousins, r Julia and dearest Mrs Rushworth;' they nd me at home yesterday, and we were glad e each other again. We seemed very glad to each other, and I do really think we were a e. We had a vast deal to say. Shall I tell how Mrs Rushworth looked when your name mentioned? I did not use to think her wantin self-possession, but she had not quite igh for the demands of yesterday. Upon whole Julia was in the best looks of the two, east after you were spoken of. There was no vering the complexion from the moment that oke of 'Fanny,' and spoke of her as a sister ld. But Mrs Rushworth's day of good looks come; we have cards for her first party on 28th. Then she will be in beauty, for she will n one of the best houses in Wimpole Street. as in it two years ago, when it was Lady celle's, and prefer it to almost any I know in don, and certainly she will then feel, to use a gar phrase, that she has got her pennyworth her penny. Henry could not have afforded such a house. I hope she will recollect it, and atisfied, as well as she may, with moving the F2291 queen of a palace, though the king may app best in the background; and as I have no de to tease her, I shall never force your name up her again. She will grow sober by degrees. Fr all that I hear and guess, Baron Wildenhei attentions to Julia continue, but I do not kn that he has any serious encouragement. ought to do better. A poor honourable is catch, and I cannot imagine any liking in case, for, take away his rants, and the poor bar has nothing. What a difference a vowel mak If his rents were but equal to his rants! Yo cousin Edmund moves slowly; detained, p chance, by parish duties. There may be some of woman at Thornton Lacey to be converted. am unwilling to fancy myself neglected for young one. Adieu! my dear sweet Fanny, this a long letter from London: write me a pretty o in reply to gladden Henry's eyes, when he com back, and send me an account of all the dashin young captains whom you disdain for his sake

There was great food for meditation in the letter, and chiefly for unpleasant meditation; and yet, with all the uneasiness it supplied, it connected her with the absent, it told her of peop and things about whom she had never felt as much curiosity as now, and she would have been glad to have been sure of such a letter ever week. Her correspondence with her aunt Ber tram was her only concern of higher interest.

[230]

s for any society in Portsmouth, that could I make amends for deficiencies at home, there e none within the circle of her father's and ner's acquaintance to afford her the smallest faction: she saw nobody in whose favour could wish to overcome her own shyness and rve. The men appeared to her all coarse, the en all pert, everybody underbred; and she e as little contentment as she received from oductions either to old or new acquaintance. young ladies who approached her at first some respect, in consideration of her comfrom a baronet's family, were soon offended what they termed "airs"; for, as she neither ed on the piano-forte, nor wore fine pelisses, could, on farther observation, admit no right uperiority.

he first solid consolation which Fanny reed for the evils of home, the first which her gment could entirely approve, and which gave promise of durability, was in a better knowlof Susan, and a hope of being of service to Susan had always behaved pleasantly to herbut the determined character of her general ners had astonished and alarmed her, and it at least a fortnight before she began to erstand a disposition so totally different from own. Susan saw that much was wrong at e, and wanted to set it right. That a girl of fourteen, acting only on her own unassisted : son, should err in the method of reform, was wonderful; and Fanny soon became more posed to admire the natural light of the m which could so early distinguish justly, than censure severely the faults of conduct to wh it led. Susan was only acting on the same tru and pursuing the same system, which her o judgment acknowledged, but which her m supine and yielding temper would have shru from asserting. Susan tried to be useful, wh she could only have gone away and cried; a that Susan was useful she could perceive; the things, bad as they were, would have been wo but for such interposition, and that both ] mother and Betsey were restrained from so excesses of very offensive indulgence and v garity.

[231]

In every argument with her mother, Susan h in point of reason the advantage, and never w there any maternal tenderness to buy her of The blind fondness which was for ever producin evil around her she had never known. There w no gratitude for affection past or present make her better bear with its excesses to to others.

All this became gradually evident, and gra ually placed Susan before her sister as an obje of mingled compassion and respect. That h [232] her was wrong, however, at times very og, her measures often ill-chosen and illd, and her looks and language very often fensible, Fanny could not cease to feel; but egan to hope they might be rectified. Susan, found, looked up to her and wished for her opinion; and new as anything like an office athority was to Fanny, new as it was to ime herself capable of guiding or informing one, she did resolve to give occasional hints busan, and endeavour to exercise for her ntage the juster notions of what was due rerybody, and what would be wisest for herwhich her own more favoured education had in her.

er influence, or at least the consciousness and of it, originated in an act of kindness by n, which, after many hesitations of delicacy, at last worked herself up to. It had very occurred to her that a small sum of money t, perhaps, restore peace for ever on the sore ect of the silver knife, canvassed as it now continually, and the riches which she was in ession of herself, her uncle having given her at parting, made her as able as she was willto be generous. But she was so wholly unto confer favours, except on the very poor, appractised in removing evils, or bestowing messes among her equals, and so fearful of appearing to elevate herself as a great lady home, that it took some time to determine t it would not be unbecoming in her to make s a present. It was made, however, at last; a sil knife was bought for Betsey, and accepted w great delight, its newness giving it every adv tage over the other that could be desired; Su was established in the full possession of her or Betsey handsomely declaring that now she h got one so much prettier herself, she should ne want that again; and no reproach seemed co veyed to the equally satisfied mother, which Fan had almost feared to be impossible. The de thoroughly answered; a source of domestic alt cation was entirely done away, and it was t means of opening Susan's heart to her, and g ing her something more to love and be interest in. Susan shewed that she had delicacy: pleas as she was to be mistress of property which s had been struggling for at least two years, s yet feared that her sister's judgment had be against her, and that a reproof was designed h for having so struggled as to make the purcha necessary for the tranquillity of the house.

[233]

Her temper was open. She acknowledged h fears, blamed herself for having contended warmly; and from that hour Fanny, understaning the worth of her disposition, and perceivin how fully she was inclined to seek her good opin [234] and refer to her judgment, began to feel n the blessing of affection, and to entertain nope of being useful to a mind so much in of help, and so much deserving it. She gave e, advice too sound to be resisted by a good rstanding, and given so mildly and considly as not to irritate an imperfect temper, and had the happiness of observing its good ts not unfrequently. More was not expected ne who, while seeing all the obligation and diency of submission and forbearance, saw with sympathetic acuteness of feeling that must be hourly grating to a girl Susan. Her greatest wonder on the subsoon became-not that Susan should have provoked into disrespect and impatience nst her better knowledge—that so much r knowledge, so many good notions should been hers at all; and that, brought up in the t of negligence and error, she should have ned such proper opinions of what ought e; she, who had had no cousin Edmund to t her thoughts or fix her principles.

he intimacy thus begun between them was a rial advantage to each. By sitting together airs, they avoided a great deal of the disance of the house; Fanny had peace, and n learned to think it no misfortune to be ly employed. They sat without a fire; but that was a privation familiar even to Fanny, she suffered the less because reminded by i the East room. It was the only point of res blance. In space, light, furniture, and prosp there was nothing alike in the two apartme and she often heaved a sigh at the remembra of all her books and boxes, and various comf there. By degrees the girls came to spend chief of the morning upstairs, at first only working and talking, but after a few days, remembrance of the said books grew so po and stimulative, that Fanny found it impos not to try for books again. There were non her father's house; but wealth is luxurious daring, and some of hers found its way to a culating library. She became a subscri amazed at being anything in propria pers amazed at her own doings in every way, to a renter, a chuser of books! And to be have any one's improvement in view in her cho But so it was. Susan had read nothing, Fanny longed to give her a share in her first pleasures, and inspire a taste for the b raphy and poetry which she delighted in here

[235]

In this occupation she hoped, moreover, to to some of the recollections of Mansfield, we were too apt to seize her mind if her fingers of were busy; and especially at this time, hope might be useful in diverting her thoughts for [236] suing Edmund to London, whither, on the nority of her aunt's last letter, she knew he gone. She had no doubt of what would en-The promised notification was hanging over head. The postman's knock within the neighrhood was beginning to bring its daily terrors, if reading could banish the idea for even half hour, it was something gained.

CHAPTER XLI.

WEEK was gone since Edmund might be supposed in town, and Fanny had heard nothing of him. There were three erent conclusions to be drawn from his silence, ween which her mind was in fluctuation; each them at times being held the most probable. her his going had been again delayed, or he yet procured no opportunity of seeing Miss wford alone, or he was too happy for letterting!

one morning, about this time, Fanny having been nearly four weeks from Mansfield, a at which she never failed to think over and ulate every day, as she and Susan were preing to remove, as usual, upstairs, they were at by the knock of a visitor, whom they felt they could not avoid, from Rebecca's alertn in going to the door, a duty which always int ested her beyond any other.

[237]

It was a gentleman's voice; it was a voice the Fanny was just turning pale about, when I Crawford walked into the room.

Good sense, like hers, will always act whe really called upon; and she found that she he been able to name him to her mother, and reacher her remembrance of the name, as that of "W liam's friend," though she could not previous have believed herself capable of uttering a sy lable at such a moment. The consciousness of her being known there only as William's friend we some support. Having introduced him, however and being all reseated, the terrors that occurr of what this visit might lead to were overpower ing, and she fancied herself on the point of fair ing away.

While trying to keep herself alive, their visito who had at first approached her with as animate a countenance as ever, was wisely and kind keeping his eyes away, and giving her time recover, while he devoted himself entirely to he mother, addressing her, and attending to her with the utmost politeness and propriety, at the sam time with a degree of friendliness, of interess at least, which was making his manner perfect rmed by the sight of such a friend to her and regulated by the wish or appearing to antage before him, she was overflowing with itude, artless, maternal gratitude, which d not be unpleasing. Mr Price was out, the she regretted very much. Fanny was just vered enough to feel that she could not reit; for to her many other sources of uneasiwas added the severe one of shame for the e in which he found her. She might scold elf for the weakness, but there was no scoldit away. She was ashamed, and she would be been yet more ashamed of her father than ll the rest.

Mrs Price's manners were also at their bes [238]

hey talked of William; a subject on which Price could never tire; and Mr Crawford as warm in his commendation as even her t could wish. She felt that she had never so agreeable a man in her life; and was only nished to find, that so great and so agreeable e was, he should be come down to Portsmouth her on a visit to the port-admiral, nor the missioner, nor yet with the intention of going to the island, nor of seeing the dock-yard. hing of all that she had been used to think s the proof of importance, or the employment vealth, had brought him to Portsmouth. He reached it late the night before, was come for y or two, was staying at the Crown, had accidentally met with a navy officer or two of acquaintance since his arrival, but had no obj of that kind in coming.

[239]

By the time he had given all this informati it was not unreasonable to suppose that Fan might be looked at and spoken to; and she v tolerably able to bear his eye, and hear that had spent half an hour with his sister the eveni before his leaving London; that she had sent l best and kindest love, but had had no time t writing; that he thought himself lucky in seei Mary for even half an hour, having spent scarce twenty-four hours in London, after his retu from Norfolk, before he set off again; that h cousin Edmund was in town, had been in tow he understood, a few days; that he had not se him himself, but that he was well, had left the all well at Mansfield, and was to dine, as yested day, with the Frasers.

Fanny listened collectedly, even to the last mentioned circumstance; nay, it seemed a relito her worn mind to be at any certainty; and the words, "then by this time it is all settled," passe internally, without more evidence of emotion than a faint blush.

After talking a little more about Mansfield, subject in which her interest was most apparen Crawford began to hint at the expediency of a early walk. "It was a lovely morning, and a [240] season of the year a fine morning so often ed off, that it was wisest for everybody not elay their exercise;" and such hints producing ing, he soon proceeded to a positive recomdation to Mrs Price and her daughters, to their walk without loss of time. Now they e to an understanding. Mrs Price, it aped, scarcely ever stirred out of doors, except Sunday; she owned she could seldom, with large family, find time for a walk. "Would not, then, persuade her daughters to take adtage of such weather, and allow him the pleasof attending them?" Mrs Price was greatly ged and very complying. "Her daughters e very much confined; Portsmouth was a sad e; they did not often get out; and she knew had some errands in the town, which they ld be very glad to do." And the consequence , that Fanny, strange as it was, strange, awkd, and distressing, found herself and Susan, in ten minutes, walking towards the High et, with Mr Crawford.

t was soon pain upon pain, confusion upon fusion; for they were hardly in the High eet, before they met her father, whose appeare was not the better from its being Saturday. stopt; and, ungentlemanlike as he looked, my was obliged to introduce him to Mr Crawl. She could not have a doubt of the manner in which Mr Crawford must be struck. He must be ashamed and disgusted altogether. He must soon give her up, and cease to have the small inclination for the match; and yet, though s had been so much wanting his affection to cured, this was a sort of cure that would be most as bad as the complaint; and I believe the is scarcely a young lady in the United Kingdor who would not rather put up with the misfortu of being sought by a clever, agreeable man, th have him driven away by the vulgarity of 1 nearest relations.

[241]

Mr Crawford probably could not regard future father-in-law with any idea of taking h for a model in dress; but (as Fanny instant and to her great relief, discerned) her father w a very different man, a very different Mr Pr in his behaviour to this most highly respect stranger, from what he was in his own family home. His manners now, though not polish were more than passable; they were grateful, a mated, manly; his expressions were those of attached father, and a sensible man; his loud tor did very well in the open air, and there was no single oath to be heard. Such was his instinct compliment to the good manners of Mr Cra ford; and, be the consequence what it mig Fanny's immediate feelings were infinite soothed.

[242]

he conclusion of the two gentlemen's civilities an offer of Mr Price's to take Mr Crawford the dock-yard, which Mr Crawford, desirous ccepting as a favour what was intended as , though he had seen the dock-vard again and n, and hoping to be so much the longer with ny, was very gratefully disposed to avail himof, if the Miss Prices were not afraid of atigue; and as it was somehow or other ascered, or inferred, or at least acted upon, that were not at all afraid, to the dock-yard they all to go; and but for Mr Crawford, Mr e would have turned thither directly, without smallest consideration for his daughters' ers in the High Street. He took care, however, they should be allowed to go to the shops they e out expressly to visit; and it did not delay long, for Fanny could so little bear to eximpatience, or be waited for, that before the lemen, as they stood at the door, could do than begin upon the last naval regulations, ttle the number of three-deckers now in comon, their companions were ready to proceed. ney were then to set forward for the dockat once, and the walk would have been coned (according to Mr Crawford's opinion) in gular manner, had Mr Price been allowed entire regulation of it, as the two girls, he d, would have been left to follow, and keep up with them or not, as they could, while the walked on together at their own hasty pace. I was able to introduce some improvement occsionally, though by no means to the extent wished; he absolutely would not walk away frathem; and at any crossing or any crowd, whe Mr Price was only calling out, "Come, gin come, Fan; come, Sue, take care of yourselvkeep a sharp lookout!" he would give them particular attendance.

[243]

Once fairly in the dock-yard, he began reckon upon some happy intercourse with Fan as they were very soon joined by a brother loung of Mr Price's, who was come to take his da survey of how things went on, and who m prove a far more worthy companion than hi self; and after a time the two officers seemed ve well satisfied going about together, and discu ing matters of equal and never-failing interewhile the young people sat down upon some ti bers in the yard, or found a seat on board a v sel in the stocks which they all went to look Fanny was most conveniently in want of re-Crawford could not have wished her more tigued or more ready to sit down; but he co have wished her sister away. A quick looking a of Susan's age was the very worst third in world; totally different from Lady Bertram, eyes and ears; and there was no introducing [244] point before her. He must content himself being only generally agreeable, and letting n have her share of entertainment, with the gence, now and then, of a look or hint for etter informed and conscious Fanny. Norwas what he had mostly to talk of: there d been some time, and everything there was g in importance from his present schemes. a man could come from no place, no society, out importing something to amuse; his jourand his acquaintance were all of use, and n was entertained in a way quite new to her. Fanny, somewhat more was related than the ental agreeableness of the parties he had in. For her approbation, the particular reaof going into Norfolk at all, at this unusual of year, was given. It had been real busirelative to the renewal of a lease in which velfare of a large and (he believed) induss family was at stake. He had suspected his t of some underhand dealing; of meaning to him against the deserving; and he had deterd to go himself, and thoroughly investigate nerits of the case. He had gone, had done more good than he had foreseen, had been al to more than his first plan had compreed, and was now able to congratulate himupon it, and to feel, that in performing a , he had secured agreeable recollections for [245] his own mind. He had introduced himself to s tenants, whom he had never seen before; he begun making acquaintance with cottages w. very existence, though on his own estate, had l hitherto unknown to him. This was aimed, well aimed, at Fanny. It was pleasing to ] him speak so properly; here he had been ac as he ought to do. To be the friend of the and the oppressed! Nothing could be more gr ful to her; and she was on the point of give him an approving look when it was all frighte off, by his adding a something too pointed of hoping soon to have an assistant, a friend, a g in every plan of utility or charity for Ever ham; a somebody that would make Evering and all about it a dearer object than it had been vet.

She turned away, and wished he would not such things. She was willing to allow he m have more good qualities than she had been v to suppose. She began to feel the possibility his turning out well at last; but he was and n ever be completely unsuited to her, and ought to think of her.

He perceived that enough had been said Everingham, and that it would be as well to of something else, and turned to Mansfield. could not have chosen better; that was a topi bring back her attention and her looks alm [246] ntly. It was a real indulgence to her to hear speak of Mansfield. Now so long divided everybody who knew the place, she felt te the voice of a friend when he mentioned d led the way to her fond exclamations in e of its beauties and comforts, and by his arable tribute to its inhabitants allowed her atify her own heart in the warmest eulogium, eaking of her uncle as all that was clever good, and her aunt as having the sweetest of veet tempers.

e had a great attachment to Mansfield himhe said so; he looked forward with the hope ending much, very much, of his time there; we there, or in the neighbourhood. He pararly built upon a very happy summer and nn there this year; he felt that it would be e depended upon it; a summer and autumn tely superior to the last. As animated, as sified, as social, but with circumstances of iority undescribable.

Iansfield, Sotherton, Thornton Lacey," he nued, "what a society will be comprised in houses! And at Michaelmas, perhaps, a th may be added: some small hunting-box in icinity of everything so dear; for as to any hership in Thornton Lacey, as Edmund Beronce good-humouredly proposed, I hope I ee two objections: two fair, excellent, irrele objections to that plan."

[247]

Fanny was doubly silenced here; though we the moment was passed, could regret that she not forced herself into the acknowledged of prehension of one half of his meaning, and couraged him to say something more of his st and Edmund. It was a subject which she re learn to speak of, and the weakness that shr from it would soon be quite unpardonable.

When Mr Price and his friend had seen that they wished, or had time for, the others y ready to return; and in the course of their v back, Mr Crawford contrived a minute's priv for telling Fanny that his only business in Po mouth was to see her; that he was come down a couple of days on her account and hers o and because he could not endure a longer t separation. She was sorry, really sorry; and in spite of this and the two or three other thi which she wished he had not said, she thou him altogether improved since she had seen h he was much more gentle, obliging, and atten to other people's feelings than he had ever b at Mansfield; she had never seen him so agr able-so near being agreeable; his behaviour her father could not offend, and there was so thing particularly kind and proper in the not he took of Susan. He was decidedly improv She wished the next day over, she wished he l come only for one day; but it was not so v [248] as she would have expected: the pleasure of ing of Mansfield was so very great!

efore they parted, she had to thank him for ther pleasure, and one of no trivial kind. Her are asked him to do them the honour of taking mutton with them, and Fanny had time for one thrill of horror, before he declared himprevented by a prior engagement. He was aged to dinner already both for that day and next; he had met with some acquaintance at Crown who would not be denied; he should e the honour, however, of waiting on them in on the morrow, &c., and so they parted ny in a state of actual felicity from escaping orrible an evil!

b have had him join their family dinner-party, see all their deficiencies, would have been dful! Rebecca's cookery and Rebecca's waitand Betsey's eating at table without restraint, pulling everything about as she chose, were t Fanny herself was not yet enough inured or her often to make a tolerable meal. She nice only from natural delicacy, but he had brought up in a school of luxury and epism.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE Prices were just setting off for ch the next day when Mr Crawford peared again. He came, not to stop, to join them; he was asked to go with them to Garrison chapel, which was exactly what he intended, and they all walked thither togeth

The family were now seen to advantage. ture had given them no inconsiderable shar beauty, and every Sunday dressed them in t cleanest skins and best attire. Sunday alw bought this comfort to Fanny, and on this S day she felt it more than ever. Her poor mo now did not look so very unworthy of b Lady Bertram's sister as she was but too to look. It often grieved her to the heart, to the of the contrast between them; to think that w nature had made so little difference, circ stances should have made so much, and that mother, as handsome as Lady Bertram, and s years her junior, should have an appearance much more worn and faded, so comfortless slatternly, so shabby. But Sunday made h very creditable and tolerably cheerful-lool Mrs Price, coming abroad with a fine family children, feeling a little respite of her we cares, and only discomposed if she saw her l [250]

nto danger, or Rebecca pass by with a flower r hat.

chapel they were obliged to divide, but Mr ford took care not to be divided from the le branch; and after chapel he still continvith them, and made one in the family party he ramparts.

rs Price took her weekly walk on the ramevery fine Sunday throughout the year, ys going directly after morning service and ng till dinner-time. It was her public place: she met her acquaintance, heard a little , talked over the badness of the Portsmouth ents, and wound up her spirits for the six ensuing.

hither they now went; Mr Crawford most y to consider the Miss Prices as his peculiar ge; and before they had been there long, how or other, there was no saying how, by could not have believed it, but he was ang between them with an arm of each under and she did not know how to prevent or put and to it. It made her uncomfortable for a but yet there were enjoyments in the day in the view which would be felt.

e day was uncommonly lovely. It was really h; but it was April in its mild air, brisk soft and bright sun, occasionally clouded for a te; and everything looked so beautiful under the influence of such a sky; the effects of shadows pursuing each other on the ships at S head and the island beyond, with the ever-vary hues of the sea, now at high water, dancing in glee and dashing against the ramparts with fine a sound, produced altogether such a con nation of charms for Fanny, as made her gr ually almost careless of the circumstances un which she felt them. Nay, had she been with his arm, she would soon have known that needed it, for she wanted strength for a hours' saunter of this kind, coming, as it get ally did, upon a week's previous inactivity. Far was beginning to feel the effect of being del red from her usual regular exercise; she had ground as to health since her being in Po mouth; and but for Mr Crawford and the bea of the weather would soon have been knocked now.

[251]

The loveliness of the day, and of the vi he felt like herself. They often stopt with same sentiment and taste, leaning against wall, some minutes, to look and admire, and c sidering he was not Edmund, Fanny could but allow that he was sufficiently open to charms of nature, and very well able to expuhis admiration. She had a few tender rever now and then, which he could sometimes take vantage of to look in her face without detecti [252] the result of these looks was, that though witching as ever, her face was less blooming it ought to be. She said she was very well, lid not like to be supposed otherwise; but t all in all, he was convinced that her present ence could not be comfortable, and therecould not be salutary for her, and he was ing anxious for her being again at Manswhere her own happiness, and his in seeing must be so much greater.

ou have been here a month, I think?" said he. o; not quite a month. It is only four weeks prrow since I left Mansfield."

ou are a most accurate and honest reckoner. uld call that a month."

did not arrive here till Tuesday evening."

nd it is to be a two months' visit, is not it?" es. My uncle talked of two months. I supit will not be less."

nd how are you to be conveyed back again? comes for you?"

do not know. I have heard nothing about from my aunt. Perhaps I may be to stay r. It may not be convenient for me to be ed exactly at the two months' end."

ter a moment's reflection, Mr Crawford re-"I know Mansfield, I know its way, I know ults towards you. I know the danger of being so far forgotten, as to have your comforts give way to the imaginary convenienc any single being in the family. I am aware you may be left here week after week, if Thomas cannot settle everything for con himself, or sending your aunt's maid for without involving the slightest alteration of arrangements which he may have laid down the next quarter of a year. This will not Two months is an ample allowance; I she think six weeks quite enough. I am conside your sister's health," said he, addressing him to Susan, "which I think the confinement Portsmouth unfavourable to. She requires stant air and exercise. When you know he well as I do, I am sure you will agree that does, and that she ought never to be long | ished from the free air and liberty of the co try. If, therefore" (turning again to Fam "you find yourself growing unwell, and any o culties arise about your returning to Mansf without waiting for the two months to be en that must not be regarded as of any conseque if you feel yourself at all less strong or comf able than usual, and will only let my sister k it, give her only the slightest hint, she and I immediately come down, and take you back Mansfield. You know the ease and the please with which this would be done. You know that would be felt on the occasion."

[253]

[254]

nny thanked him, but tried to laugh it off. am perfectly serious," he replied, "as you ctly know. And I hope you will not be y concealing any tendency to indisposition. ed, you shall not; it shall not be in your r; for so long only as you positively say, in letter to Mary, 'I am well,' and I know cannot speak or write a falsehood, so long shall you be considered as well."

nny thanked him again, but was affected listressed to a degree that made it impossior her to say much, or even to be certain of she ought to say. This was towards the of their walk. He attended them to the and left them only at the door of their own , when he knew them to be going to dinand therefore pretended to be waited for here.

wish you were not so tired," said he, still ning Fanny after all the others were in the —"I wish I left you in stronger health. Is anything I can do for you in town? I have an idea of going into Norfolk again soon. not satisfied about Maddison. I am sure he heans to impose on me if possible, and get sin of his own into a certain mill, which I in for somebody else. I must come to an standing with him. I must make him know I will not be tricked on the south side of Everingham, any more than on the north: I will be master of my own property. I was explicit enough with him before. The miss such a man does on an estate, both as to the c of his employer and the welfare of the poo inconceivable. I have a great mind to go into Norfolk directly, and put everything at on such a footing as cannot be afterway swerved from. Maddison is a clever fello do not wish to displace him, provided he does try to displace me; but it would be simple t duped by a man who has no right of credite dupe me, and worse than simple to let him me a hard-hearted, griping fellow for a ter instead of an honest man, to whom I have g half a promise already. Would it not be w than simple? Shall I go? Do you advise it

[255]

"I advise! You know very well what is rig

"Yes. When you give me your opinion," ways know what is right. Your judgment is rule of right."

"Oh, no! do not say so. We have all a be guide in ourselves, if we would attend to it, any other person can be. Good-bye; I wish a pleasant journey to-morrow."

"Is there nothing I can do for you in town "Nothing, I am much obliged to you."

"Have you no message for anybody?"

"My love to your sister, if you please; [256]

He attended to them to the last and left them only at the door of their own house you see my cousin, my cousin Edmund, I you would be so good as to say that I sup-I shall soon hear from him."

ertainly; and if he is lazy or negligent, I write his excuses myself."

e could say no more, for Fanny would be nger detained. He pressed her hand, looked r, and was gone. He went to while away the three hours as he could, with his other actance, till the best dinner that a capital inn ded was ready for their enjoyment, and rned in to her more simple one immediately. eir general fare bore a very different char-; and could he have suspected how many tions, besides that of exercise, she endured r father's house, he would have wondered her looks were not much more affected than ound them. She was so little equal to Re-'s puddings and Rebecca's hashes, brought ble, as they all were, with such accompants of half-cleaned plates, and not halfed knives and forks, that she was very often rained to defer her heartiest meal till she send her brothers in the evening for biscuits ouns. After being nursed up at Mansfield, s too late in the day to be hardened at Portsh; and though Sir Thomas, had he known night have thought his niece in the most ising way of being starved, both mind and body, into a much juster value for Mr C ford's good company and good fortune, he w probably have feared to push his experin farther, lest she might die under the cure.

[257]

Fanny was out of spirits all the rest of day. Though tolerably secure of not seeing Crawford again, she could not help being It was parting with somebody of the natur a friend; and though, in one light, glad to him gone, it seemed as if she was now dese by everybody; it was a sort of renewed sep tion from Mansfield; and she could not thin his returning to town, and being frequently Mary and Edmund, without feelings so near to envy as made her hate herself for ha them.

Her dejection had no abatement from thing passing around her; a friend or two of father's, as always happened if he was not them, spent the long, long evening there; from six o'clock till half-past nine, there little intermission of noise or grog. She was low. The wonderful improvement which she fancied in Mr Crawford was the nearest to ministering comfort of anything within the rent of her thoughts. Not considering in how ferent a circle she had been just seeing him, how much might be owing to contrast, she quite persuaded of his being astonishingly r [258]

e and regardful of others than formerly. if in little things, must it not be so in great? nxious for her health and comfort, so very ng as he now expressed himself, and really ed, might not it be fairly supposed that he d not much longer persevere in a suit so disng to her?

CHAPTER XLIII.

was presumed that Mr Crawford was travelling back to London, on the morrow, for nothing more was seen of him at Mr Price's; two days afterwards, it was a fact ascerd to Fanny by the following letter from his , opened and read by her, on another act, with the most anxious curiosity:—

have to inform you, my dearest Fanny, Henry has been down to Portsmouth to see that he had a delightful walk with you to ock-yard last Saturday, and one still more dwelt on the next day, on the ramparts; the balmy air, the sparkling sea, and your looks and conversation were altogether in nost delicious harmony, and afforded sensawhich are to raise ecstasy even in retrospect. as well as I understand, is to be the substance of my information. He makes me w but I do not know what else is to be comm cated, except this said visit to Portsmouth. these two said walks, and his introduction to family, especially to a fair sister of yours, a girl of fifteen, who was of the party on the r parts, taking her first lesson, I presume, in l I have not time for writing much, but it we be out of place if I had, for this is to be a n letter of business, penned for the purpose of veying necessary information, which could be delayed without risk of evil. My dear, of Fanny, if I had you here, how I would tall you! You should listen to me till you were ti and advise me till you were still tired more; it is impossible to put a hundredth part of great mind on paper, so I will abstain altoget and leave you to guess what you like. I have news for you. You have politics, of course; it would be too bad to plague you with the na of people and parties that fill up my time. ought to have sent you an account of your c in's first party, but I was lazy, and now i too long ago; suffice it, that everything was as it ought to be, in a style that any of her of nections must have been gratified to witness, that her own dress and manners did her the gr est credit. My friend, Mrs Fraser, is mad such a house, and it would not make me misera [260] to Lady Stornaway after Easter; she seems gh spirits, and very happy. I fancy Lord S. ry good-humoured and pleasant in his own ly, and I do not think him so very ill-looking did-at least, one sees many worse. He will lo by the side of your cousin Edmund. Of ast-mentioned hero, what shall I say? If I led his name entirely, it would look susus. I will say, then, that we have seen him or three times, and that my friends here are much struck with his gentleman-like appear-Mrs Fraser (no bad judge) declares she vs but three men in town who have so good rson, height, and air; and I must confess. he dined here the other day, there were none mpare with him, and we were a party of en. Luckily there is no distinction of dress a-days to tell tales, but-but-but-had almost forgot (it was Edmund's fault: ets into my head more than does me good) rery material thing I had to say from Henry myself—I mean about our taking you back Northamptonshire. My dear little creature, ot stay at Portsmouth to lose your pretty . Those vile sea-breezes are the ruin of ty and health. My poor aunt always felt ted if within ten miles of the sea, which the Admiral of course never believed, but I know was so. I am at your service and Henry's, a hour's notice. I should like the scheme, and would make a little circuit, and shew you E ingham in our way, and perhaps you would mind passing through London, and seeing inside of St. George's, Hanover Square. ( keep your cousin Edmund from me at su time: I should not like to be tempted. Wh long letter! one word more. Henry, I find, some idea of going into Norfolk again upon s business that you approve; but this cannot p bly be permitted before the middle of next w that is, he cannot anyhow be spared till after 14th, for we have a party that evening. value of a man like Henry, on such an occa is what you can have no conception of; so must take it upon my word to be inestimable. will see the Rushworths, which I own I am sorry for-having a little curiosity, and think has he-though he will not acknowle it."

[259]

Yours affectionately.

[261]

This was a letter to be run through eagerly be read deliberately, to supply matter for n reflection, and to leave everything in greater pense than ever. The only certainty to be dr from it was, that nothing decisive had yet ta place. Edmund had not yet spoken. How 2 Crawford really felt, how she meant to ac [262]

t act without or against her meaning; her his importance to her were quite what it been before the last separation; whether, if ned, it were likely to lessen more, or to reitself, were subjects for endless conjecture, o be thought of on that day and many days ne, without producing any conclusion. The that returned the oftenest was that Miss ford, after proving herself cooled and stagl by a return to London habits, would yet e herself in the end too much attached to to give him up. She would try to be more tious than her heart would allow. She would te, she would teaze, she would condition, vould require a great deal, but she would v accept.

is was Fanny's most frequent [expecta-* A house in town, that, she thought, must apossible. Yet there was no saying what Crawford might not ask. The prospect for ousin grew worse and worse. The woman could speak of him, and speak only of his arance! What an unworthy attachment! To riving support from the commendations of Fraser! She who had known him intimately a year! Fanny was ashamed of her. Those of the letter which related only to Mr ford and herself, touched her, in comparixpectations" in the early editions.

[263]

son, slightly. Whether Mr Crawford went Norfolk before or after the 14th was certa no concern of her's, though, everything conered, she thought he would go without de That Miss Crawford should endeavour to se a meeting between him and Mrs Rushworth, all in her worst line of conduct, and grossly kind and ill-judged; but she hoped he would be actuated by any such degrading curiosity. acknowledged no such inducement, and his s ought to have given him credit for better feel than her own.

She was yet more impatient for another left from town after receiving this than she had left before; and for a few days was so unsettled it altogether, by what had come, and what m come, that her usual readings and conversa with Susan were much suspended. She could command her attention as she wished. If Crawford remembered her message to her conshe thought it very likely, most likely, tha would write to her at all events; it would be n consistent with his usual kindness; and till got rid of this idea, till it gradually wore off no letters appearing in the course of three four days more, she was in a most restless, a ious state.

At length, a something like composure ceeded. Suspense must be submitted to, [264] not be allowed to wear her out, and make seless. Time did something, her own exersomething more, and she resumed her attento Susan, and again awakened the same int in them.

san was growing very fond of her, and gh without any of the early delight in books, had been so strong in Fanny, with a dispomuch less inclined to sedentary pursuits, or formation for information's sake, she had cong a desire of not appearing ignorant, as, a good clear understanding, made her a most tive, profitable, thankful pupil. Fanny was oracle. Fanny's explanations and remarks a most important addition to every essay, very chapter of history. What Fanny told f former times dwelt more on her mind than ages of Goldsmith; and she paid her sister compliment of preferring her style to that y printed author. The early habit of readvas wanting.

eir conversations, however, were not always bjects so high as history or morals. Others their hour; and of lesser matters, none reed so often, or remained so long between , as Mansfield Park, a description of the peothe manners, the amusements, the ways of sfield Park. Susan, who had an innate taste the genteel and well-appointed, was eager to hear, and Fanny could not but indulge h in dwelling on so beloved a theme. She it was not wrong; though, after a time, S very great admiration of everything said o in her uncle's house, and earnest longing into Northamptonshire, seemed almost to her for exciting feelings which could r gratified.

[265]

Poor Susan was very little better fitte home than her elder sister; and as Fanny thoroughly to understand this, she began t that when her own release from Ports came, her happiness would have a material back in leaving Susan behind. That a g capable of being made everything good s be left in such hands, distressed her mor more. Were she likely to have a home to her to, what a blessing it would be! And been possible for her to return Mr Craw regard, the probability of his being very far objecting to such a measure would have be greatest increase of all her own comforts. thought he was really good-tempered, and fancy his entering into a plan of that sort pleasantly.

CHAPTER XLIV.

EVEN weeks of the two months were very nearly gone, when the one letter, the letter from Edmund, so long expected, was into Fanny's hands. As she opened, and its length, she prepared herself for a minute il of happiness and a profusion of love and se towards the fortunate creature who was mistress of his fate. These were the cons:—

"Mansfield Park.

My DEAR FANNY,—Excuse me that I have written before. Crawford told me that you e wishing to hear from me, but I found it imible to write from London, and persuaded elf that you would understand my silence. ld I have sent a few happy lines, they should have been wanting, but nothing of that nawas ever in my power. I am returned to sfield in a less assured state than when I it. My hopes are much weaker. You are ably aware of this already. So very fond ou as Miss Crawford is, it is most natural she should tell you enough of her own feel-, to furnish a tolerable guess at mine. I will be prevented, however, from making my own munication. Our confidences in you need [267] not clash. I ask no questions. There is som soothing in the idea that we have the same and that whatever unhappy differences of ion may exist between us, we are united love of you. It will be a comfort to me to t how things now are, and what are my plans, if plans I can be said to have. I hav returned since Saturday. I was three w London, and saw her (for London) very I had every attention from the Frasers that be reasonably expected. I dare say I v reasonable in carrying with me hopes of a course at all like that of Mansfield. It manner, however, rather than any unfre of meeting. Had she been different whe see her, I should have made no complai from the very first she was altered; my ception was so unlike what I had hoped, had almost resolved on leaving London as rectly. I need not particularize. You kn weak side of her character, and may imag sentiments and expressions which were to me. She was in high spirits, and surrour those who were giving all the support of own bad sense to her too lively mind. I like Mrs Fraser. She is a cold-hearted, v man, who has married entirely from conv and though evidently unhappy in her m places her disappointment not to faults o [268]

, or temper, or disproportion of age, but to eing, after all, less affluent than many of her aintance, especially than her sister, Lady naway, and is the determined supporter of withing mercenary and ambitious, provided only mercenary and ambitious enough. I upon her intimacy with those two sisters as greatest misfortune of her life and mine. y have been leading her astray for years. ld she be detached from them !---and some-s I do not despair of it, for the affection ears to me principally on their side. They very fond of her; but I am sure she does not them as she loves you. When I think of great attachment to you, indeed, and the le of her judicious, upright conduct as a sisshe appears a very different creature, capable verything noble, and I am ready to blame myfor a too harsh construction of a playful ner. I cannot give her up, Fanny. She is only woman in the world whom I could ever k of as a wife. If I did not believe that she some regard for me, of course I should not this, but I do believe it. I am convinced that is not without a decided preference. I have ealousy of any individual. It is the influence he fashionable world altogether that I am ous of. It is the habits of wealth that I fear. · ideas are not higher than her own fortune [269] may warrant, but they are beyond what comes united could authorise. There is co however, even here. I could better bear her, because not rich enough, than because profession. That would only prove her af not equal to sacrifices, which, in fact, scarcely justified in asking; and, if I am r that, I think, will be the honest motive. He udices, I trust, are not so strong as the You have my thoughts exactly as they ar dear Fanny; perhaps they are sometimes dictory, but it will not be a less faithful of my mind. Having once begun, it is a ure to me to tell you all I feel. I cannot s up. Connected as we already are, and, are to be, to give up Mary Crawford wou give up the society of some of those mo to me; to banish myself from the very hou friends whom, under any other distress, 1 turn to for consolation. The loss of Mary consider as comprehending the loss of Ci and of Fanny. Were it a decided thing, a refusal, I hope I should know how to bea how to endeavour to weaken her hold heart, and in the course of a few years-t writing nonsense. Were I refused, I m it; and till I am, I can never cease to try This is the truth. The only question What may be the likeliest means? I have [270]

s thought of going to London again after er, and sometimes resolved on doing nothing he returns to Mansfield. Even now, she ks with pleasure of being in Mansfield in e; but June is at a great distance, and I ve I shall write to her. I have nearly deined on explaining myself by letter. To t an early certainty is a material object. present state is miserably irksome. Coning everything, I think a letter will be ledly the best method of explanation. I be able to write much that I could not and shall be giving her time for reflection re she resolves on her answer, and I am less id of the result of reflection than of an imiate hasty impulse; I think I am. My greatdanger would lie in her consulting Mrs ser, and I at a distance unable to help my cause. A letter exposes to all the evil of contion, and where the mind is anything short perfect decision, an adviser may, in an uny moment, lead it to do what it may afterls regret. I must think this matter over a . This long letter, full of my own concerns e, will be enough to tire even the friendship Fanny. The last time I saw Crawford was Irs Fraser's party. I am more and more satd with all that I see and hear of him. There ot a shadow of wavering. He thoroughly knows his own mind, and acts up to his tions: an inestimable quality. I could not and my eldest sister in the same room, recollecting what you once told me, an knowledge that they did not meet as There was marked coolness on her side scarcely spoke. I saw him draw back su and I was sorry that Mrs Rushworth she sent any former supposed slight to Miss B You will wish to hear my opinion of Ma gree of comfort as a wife. There is no ance of unhappiness. I hope they get on well together. I dined twice in Wimpole and might have been there oftener, but it tifying to be with Rushworth as a brothe seems to enjoy London exceedingly. I h enjoyment there, but have less here. We a lively party. You are very much wan miss you more than I can express. My desires her best love, and hopes to hear fr soon. She talks of you almost every hou am sorry to find how many weeks mor likely to be without you. My father n fetch you himself, but it will not be t Easter, when he has business in town. happy at Portsmouth, I hope, but this r be a yearly visit. I want you at home, the have your opinion about Thornton Lacey little heart for extensive improvement [272]

[271]

v that it will ever have a mistress. I think Il certainly write. It is quite settled that the its go to Bath; they leave Mansfield on Mon-I am glad of it. I am not comfortable gh to be fit for anybody; but your aunt s to feel out of luck that such an article of sfield news should fall to my pen instead of ,—Your's ever, my dearest Fanny."

never will, no, I certainly never will wish for ter again," was Fanny's secret declaration as inished this. "What do they bring but disintment and sorrow? Not till after Easter! shall I bear it? And my poor aunt talking he every hour!"

anny checked the tendency of these thoughts ell as she could, but she was within half a the of starting the idea, that Sir Thomas was e unkind, both to her aunt and to herself. For the main subject of the letter, there was ing in that to soothe irritation. She was alvexed into displeasure and anger against aund. "There is no good in this delay," said "Why is not it settled? He is blinded, and ing will open his eyes; nothing can, after had truths before him so long in vain. will marry her, and be poor and miserable. grant that her influence do not make him to be respectable!" She looked over the [273] letter again. "'So very fond of me!' 'tis nonsen all. She loves nobody but herself and her brothe 'Her friends leading her astray for years!' Sl is quite as likely to have led them astray. The have all, perhaps, been corrupting one anothe but if they are so much fonder of her than sh is of them, she is less likely to have been hur except by their flattery. 'The only woman in th world whom he could ever think of as a wife.' firmly believe it. It is an attachment to gover his whole life. Accepted or refused, his heart wedded to her for ever. 'The loss of Mary must consider as comprehending the loss o Crawford and Fanny.' Edmund, you do no know me. The families would never be connecte if you did not connect them! Oh! write, write Finish it at once. Let there be an end of thi suspense. Fix, commit, condemn yourself."

Such sensations, however, were too near akin to resentment to be long guiding Fanny's solilo quies. She was soon more softened and sorrow ful. His warm regard, his kind expressions, his confidential treatment, touched her strongly. He was only too good to everybody. It was a letter in short, which she would not but have had for the world, and which could never be valued enough. This was the end of it.

Everybody at all addicted to letter-writing, without having much to say, which will include rge proportion of the female world, at least, st feel with Lady Bertram that she was out luck in having such a capital piece of Mansl news as the certainty of the Grants going to h, occur at a time when she could make no adtage of it, and will admit that it must have n very mortifying to her to see it fall to the re of her thankless son, and treated as conly as possible at the end of a long letter, ead of having it to spread over the largest t of a page of her own. For though Lady rtram rather shone in the epistolary line, havearly in her marriage, from the want of other ployment, and the circumstance of Sir omas's being in Parliament, got into the way making and keeping correspondents, and med for herself a very creditable, commonce, amplifying style, so that a very little matwas enough for her: she could not do entirely hout any; she must have something to write out, even to her niece; and being so soon to e all the benefit of Dr Grant's gouty sympas and Mrs Grant's morning calls, it was very d upon her to be deprived of one of the last stolary uses she could put them to.

[274]

There was a rich amends, however, preparing her. Lady Bertram's hour of good luck came. thin a few days from the receipt of Edmund's er, Fanny had one from her aunt, beginning s:-

[275]

"My DEAR FANNY,—I take up my pen to comunicate some very alarming intelligence, while I make no doubt will give you much concern.

This was a great deal better than to have take up the pen to acquaint her with all the p ticulars of the Grants' intended journey, for present intelligence was of a nature to prom occupation for the pen for many days to con being no less than the dangerous illness of eldest son, of which they had received notice express a few hours before.

Tom had gone from London with a party young men to Newmarket, where a neglect fall and a good deal of drinking had brought a fever; and when the party broke up, bei unable to move, had been left by himself at the house of one of these young men to the comfor of sickness and solitude, and the attendance or of servants. Instead of being soon well enous to follow his friends, as he had then hoped, if disorder increased considerably, and it was man long before he thought so ill of himself, as to as ready as his physician to have a letter de patched to Mansfield.

"This distressing intelligence, as you may su pose," observed her ladyship, after giving t substance of it, "has agitated us exceedingly, an we cannot prevent ourselves from being great rmed and apprehensive for the poor invalid, ose state Sir Thomas fears may be very critl; and Edmund kindly proposes attending his ther immediately, but I am happy to add that Thomas will not leave me on this distressing asion, as it would be too trying for me. We Il greatly miss Edmund in our small circle, I trust and hope he will find the poor invalid a less alarming state than might be apprended, and that he will be able to bring him to insfield shortly, which Sir Thomas proposes ould be done, and thinks best on every account, I I flatter myself the poor sufferer will soon able to bear the removal without material invenience or injury. As I have little doubt of ir feeling for us, my dear Fanny, under these tressing circumstances, I will write again very n."

[276]

Fanny's feelings on the occasion were indeed asiderably more warm and genuine than her at's style of writing. She felt truly for them Tom dangerously ill, Edmund gone to atd him, and the sadly small party remaining Mansfield, were cares to shut out every other e, or almost every other. She could just find fishness enough to wonder whether Edmund d written to Miss Crawford before this sumns came, but no sentiment dwelt long with her t was not purely affectionate and disinter-estedly anxious. Her aunt did not neglect he she wrote again and again; they were receiving frequent accounts from Edmund, and these a counts were as regularly transmitted to Fann in the same diffuse style, and the same medle of trusts, hopes, and fears, all following and pr ducing each other at haphazard. It was a so of playing at being frightened. The sufferin which Lady Bertram did not see had little pow over her fancy; and she wrote very comfortab about agitation, and anxiety, and poor invalid till Tom was actually conveyed to Mansfield, an her own eyes had beheld his altered appearance Then a letter which she had been previously pr paring for Fanny was finished in a differe style, in the language of real feeling and alar then she wrote as she might have spoken. "He just come, my dear Fanny, and is taken upstain and I am so shocked to see him, that I do n know what to do. I am sure he has been very Poor Tom! I am quite grieved for him, and ve much frightened, and so is Sir Thomas; and he glad I should be if you were here to comfort n But Sir Thomas hopes he will be better to-mo row, and says we must consider his journey "

[277]

The real solicitude now awakened in the m ternal bosom was not soon over. Tom's extrem impatience to be removed to Mansfield and e perience those comforts of home and family hich had been little thought of in uninterrupted ealth, had probably induced his being conveyed ither too early, as a return of fever came on, nd for a week he was in a more alarming state an ever. They were all very seriously frightned. Lady Bertram wrote her daily terrors to er niece, who might now be said to live upon letrs' and pass all her time between suffering com that of to-day and looking forward to toorrow's. Without any particular affection for er eldest cousin, her tenderness of heart made er feel that she could not spare him, and the urity of her principles added yet a keener soliciide, when she considered how little useful, how ttle self-denying his life had (apparently) been. Susan was her only companion and listener on nis, as on more common occasions. Susan was lways ready to hear and to sympathise. Nobody se could be interested in so remote an evil as illess, in a family above an hundred miles off; ot even Mrs Price, beyond a brief question or wo, if she saw her daughter with a letter her hand, and now and then the quiet observaion of—"My poor sister Bertram must be in great deal of trouble."

So long divided and so differently situated, he ties of blood were little more than nothing. An attachment, originally as tranquil as their empers, was now become a mere name. Mrs

[279]

Price did quite as much for Lady Bertram a Lady Bertram would have done for Mrs Price Three or four Prices might have been swep away, any or all except Fanny and William, an Lady Bertram would have thought little about it; or perhaps might have caught from Mrs No ris's lips the cant of its being a very happy thin and a great blessing to their poor dear siste Price to have them so well provided for.

CHAPTER XLV.

T about the week's end from his return Mansfield, Tom's immediate danger w over, and he was so far pronounced sa as to make his mother perfectly easy; for bein now used to the sight of him in his sufferin helpless state, and hearing only the best, ar never thinking beyond what she heard, with n disposition for alarm and no aptitude at a him Lady Bertram was the happiest subject in the world for a little medical imposition. The few was subdued; the fever had been his complain of course he would soon be well again. Lac Bertram could think nothing less, and Fann shared her aunt's security, till she received a fe lines from Edmund, written purposely to giv [280]

r a clearer idea of his brother's situation, and quaint her with the apprehensions which he d his father had imbibed from the physician th respect to some strong hectic symptoms, nich seemed to seize the frame on the deparre of the fever. They judged it best that Lady ertram should not be harassed by alarms which, was to be hoped, would prove unfounded; but ere was no reason why Fanny should not know e truth. They were apprehensive for his lungs. A very few lines from Edmund showed her e patient and the sick room in a juster and ronger light than all Lady Bertram's sheets of aper could do. There was hardly any one in the ouse who might not have described, from pernal observation, better than herself; not one ho was not more useful at times to her son. She uld do nothing but glide in quietly and look at m; but when able to talk or be talked to, or ad to, Edmund was the companion he prerred. His aunt worried him by her cares, and ir Thomas knew not how to bring down his conersation or his voice to the level of irritation and eebleness. Edmund was all in all. Fanny would ertainly believe him so at last, and must find at her estimation of him was higher than ever hen he appeared as the attendant, supporter, neerer of a suffering brother. There was not nly the debility of recent illness to assist; there was also, as she now learnt, nerves much affecte spirits much depressed to calm and raise, a her own imagination added that there must be mind to be properly guided.

[281]

The family were not consumptive, and she we more inclined to hope than fear for her coust except when she thought of Miss Crawford; be Miss Crawford gave her the idea of being to child of good luck, and to her selfishness and vaity it would be good luck to have Edmund to only son.

Even in the sick chamber the fortunate Ma was not forgotten. Edmund's letter had the postscript. "On the subject of my last, I had a ually begun a letter when called away by Ton illness, but I have now changed my mind, a fear to trust the influence of friends. Whe Tom is better, I shall go."

Such was the state of Mansfield, and so it co tinued, with scarcely any change till Easter. line occasionally added by Edmund to his mot er's letter was enough for Fanny's information Tom's amendment was alarmingly slow.

Easter came particularly late this year, Fanny had most sorrowfully considered, on fi learning that she had no chance of leaving Por mouth till after it. It came, and she had yet hea nothing of her return, nothing even of the goi to London, which was to precede her return. H nt often expressed a wish for her, but there as no notice, no message from the uncle on nom all depended. She supposed he could not t leave his son, but it was a cruel, a terrible lay to her. The end of April was coming on; would soon be almost three months, instead of ro, that she had been absent from them all, and at her days had been passing in a state of pennce, which she loved them too well to hope they build thoroughly understand; and who could yet y when there might be leisure to think of or tch her?

[282]

Her eagerness, her impatience, her longings to with them, were such as to bring a line or two Cowper's Tirocinium for ever before her. With what intense desire she wants her home," as continually on her tongue, as the truest deription of a yearning which she could not supse any school-boy's bosom to feel more keenly. When she had been coming to Portsmouth, she d loved to call it her home, had been fond of ying that she was going home; the word had en very dear to her, and so it still was, but it ust be applied to Mansfield. That was now the me. Portsmouth was Portsmouth; Mansfield as home. They had been long so arranged in e indulgence of her secret meditations, and thing was more consolatory to her than to find r aunt using the same language: "I cannot but say I much regret your being from home this distressing time, so very trying to my spiri -I trust and hope, and sincerely wish you m never be absent from home so long again," we most delightful sentences to her. Still, however it was her private regale. Delicacy to her pa ents made her careful not to betray such a prefe ence of her uncle's house. It was always: "Wh I go back into Northamptonshire, or when I i turn to Mansfield, I shall do so and so." For great while it was so, but at last the longing great stronger, it overthrew caution, and she found he self talking of what she should do when she we home, before she was aware. She reproached he self, coloured, and looked fearfully towards h father and mother. She need not have been u easy. There was no sign of displeasure, or ev of hearing her. They were perfectly free from any jealousy of Mansfield. She was as welcon to wish herself there, as to be there.

[283]

It was sad to Fanny to lose all the pleasures of spring. She had not known before what pleasures she had to lose in passing March and April in town. She had not known before how much to beginnings and progress of vegetation had do lighted her. What animation, both of body and mind, she had derived from watching the advant of that season which cannot, in spite of its capriiousness, be unlovely, and seeing its increasing auties from the earliest flowers in the warmest visions of her aunt's garden, to the opening of aves of her uncle's plantations and the glory 'his woods. To be losing such pleasures was no ifle; to be losing them because she was in the idst of closeness and noise, to have confinement, ad air, bad smells, substituted for liberty, freshss, fragrance, and verdure, was infinitely worse: at even these incitements to regret were feeble, impared with what arose from the conviction of fing missed by her best friends, and the longing be useful to those who were wanting her!

[284]

Could she have been at home, she might have en of service to every creature in the house. he felt that she must have been of use to all. To l she must have saved some trouble of head hand; and were it only in supporting the spirits f her aunt Bertram, keeping her from the il of solitude, or the still greater evil of restss, officious companion, too apt to be heighteng danger in order to enhance her own importnce, her being there would have been a general ood. She loved to fancy how she could have read her aunt, how she could have talked to her, d tried at once to make her feel the blessing what was, and prepare her mind for what ight be; and how many walks up and down airs she might have saved her, and how many essages she might have carried.

[285]

It astonished her that Tom's sisters could satisfied with remaining in London at such a tin through an illness which had now, under differed degrees of danger, lasted several weeks. The might return to Mansfield when they chose; traelling could be no difficulty to them, and she counot comprehend how both could still keep awa If Mrs Rushworth could imagine any interferiobligations, Julia was certainly able to quit Lo don whenever she chose. It appeared from one her aunt's letters that Julia had offered to retuif wanted, but this was all. It was evident the she would rather remain where she was.

Fanny was disposed to think the influence London very much at war with all respectable tachments. She saw the proof of it in Miss Cra ford, as well as in her cousins; her attachment Edmund had been respectable, the most respe able part of her character; her friendship f herself had at least been blameless. Where y either sentiment now? It was so long since Fan had had any letter from her, that she had so reason to think lightly of the friendship whi had been so dwelt on. It was weeks since she h heard anything of Miss Crawford or of her oth connections in town, except through Mansfie and she was beginning to suppose that she mig never know whether Mr Crawford had gone in Norfolk again or not till they met, and mig [286] ever hear from his sister any more this spring, hen the following letter was received to revive d and create some new sensations:—

"Forgive me, my dear Fanny, as soon as you an, for my long silence, and behave as if you ould forgive me directly. This is my modest relest and expectation, for you are so good, that I epend upon being treated better than I deserve, nd I write now to beg an immediate answer. want to know the state of things at Manseld Park, and you, no doubt, are perfectly able give it. One should be a brute not to feel for ne distress they are in; and from what I hear, oor Mr Bertram has a bad chance of ultimate ecovery. I thought little of his illness at first. looked upon him as the sort of person to be nade a fuss with, and to make a fuss himself in ny trifling disorder, and was chiefly concerned or those who had to nurse him; but now it is onfidently asserted that he is really in a decline, nat the symptoms are most alarming, and that art of the family, at least, are aware of it. If be so, I am sure you must be included in that art, that discerning part, and therefore intreat ou to let me know how far I have been rightly nformed. I need not say how rejoiced I shall e to hear there has been any mistake, but the eport is so prevalent, that I confess I cannot elp trembling. To have such a fine young man cut off in the flower of his days, is most mela cholv. Poor Sir Thomas will feel it dreadful I really am quite agitated on the subject. Fam Fanny, I see you smile and look cunning, h upon my honour I never bribed a physician in r life. Poor young man! If he is to die, there w be two poor young men less in the world; a with a fearless face and bold voice would I s to any one, that wealth and consequence cou fall into no hands more deserving of them. was a foolish precipitation last Christmas, h the evil of a few days may be blotted out in pa Varnish and gilding hide many stains. It will but the loss of the Esquire after his name. W real affection, Fanny, like mine, more might overlooked. Write to me by return of post, jud of my anxiety, and do not trifle with it. Tell 1 the real truth, as you have it from the founta head. And now do not trouble yourself to ashamed of either my feelings or your own. I lieve me, they are not only natural, they are ph anthropic and virtuous. I put it to your co science, whether 'Sir Edmund' would not do mo good with all the Bertram property than a other possible 'Sir.' Had the Grants been home I would not have troubled you, but you a now the only one I can apply to for the tru his sisters not being within my reach. Mrs R. h keen spending the Easter with the Aylmers [288] wickenham (as to be sure you know), and is t yet returned; and Julia is with the cousins no live near Bedford Square, but I [forget]* eir name and street. Could I immediately apply either, however, I should still prefer you, beuse it strikes me that they have all along been unwilling to have their own amusements cut , as to shut their eyes to the truth. I suppose rs R.'s Easter holidays will not last much nger; no doubt they are thorough holidays to r. The Aylmers are pleasant people; and her sband away, she can have nothing but enjoyent. I give her credit for promoting his going ttifully down to Bath, to fetch his mother; but w will she and the dowager agree in one house? enry is not at hand, so I have nothing to say om him. Do not you think Edmund would have en in town again long ago, but for this illness? MARY. Yours ever,

[287]

"I had actually began folding my letter when enry walked in, but he brings no intelligence prevent my sending it. Mrs R. knows a deine is apprehended; he saw her this morning; she turns to Wimpole Street to-day; the old lady come. Now do not make yourself uneasy with by queer fancies, because he has been spending few days at Richmond. He does it every spring. "Forgot" in the early editions.

Be assured he cares for nobody but you. At t very moment he is wild to see you, and occupi only in contriving the means for doing so, a for making his pleasure conduce to yours. proof, he repeats, and more eagerly, what he sa at Portsmouth, about our conveying you hon and I join him in it with all my soul. Dear Fann write directly, and tell us to come. It will do all good. He and I can go to the Parsonage, y know, and be no trouble to our friends at Man field Park. It would really be gratifying to s them all again, and a little addition of socie might be of infinite use to them; and as to you self, you must feel yourself to be so wanted the that you cannot in conscience (conscientious you are) keep away, when you have the means returning. I have not time or patience to g half Henry's messages; be satisfied that the spi of each and every one is unalterable affection

Fanny's disgust at the greater part of this l ter, with her extreme reluctance to bring t writer of it and her cousin Edmund togeth would have made her (as she felt) incapable judging impartially whether the concluding off might be accepted or not. To herself, indiv ually, it was most tempting. To be finding h self perhaps within three days transported Mansfield, was an image of the greatest felici but it would have been a material drawback to ing such felicity to persons in whose feelings d conduct, at the present moment, she saw so ch to condemn; the sister's feelings, the broths conduct, her cold-hearted ambition, his ughtless vanity. To have him still the acquaintce, the flirt, perhaps, of Mrs Rushworth! She s mortified. She had thought better of him. appily, however, she was not left to weigh and cide between opposite inclinations and doubtl notions of right; there was no occasion to demine whether she ought to keep Edmund and ary asunder or not. She had a rule to apply to, ich settled everything. Her awe of her uncle, d her dread of taking a liberty with him, made instantly plain to her what she had to do. She ast absolutely decline the proposal. If he inted, he would send for her; and even to offer early return was a presumption which hardly ything would have seemed to justify. She anked Miss Crawford, but gave a decided negare. "Her uncle, she understood, meant to fetch r; and as her cousin's illness had continued so any weeks without her being thought at all cessary, she must suppose her return would be welcome at present, and that she should be felt incumbrance."

[290]

Her representation of her cousin's state at this ne was exactly according to her own belief of and such as she supposed would convey to the sanguine mind of her correspondent the hope everything she was wishing for. Edmund wo be forgiven for being a clergyman, it seem under certain conditions of wealth; and this, suspected, was all the conquest of prejudice wh he was so ready to congratulate himself up She had only learnt to think nothing of conquence but money.

[291]

CHAPTER XLVI.

S Fanny could not doubt that her answ was conveying a real disappointment, was rather in expectation, from knowledge of Miss Crawford's temper, of bei urged again; and though no second letter arriv for the space of a week, she had still the sa feeling when it did come.

On receiving it, she could instantly decide its containing little writing, and was persuad of its having the air of a letter of haste and buness. Its object was unquestionable; and t moments were enough to start the probability its being merely to give her notice that the should be in Portsmouth that very day, and throw her into all the agitation of doubting we she ought to do in such a case. If two momen wever, can surround with difficulties, a third a disperse them; and before she had opened e letter, the possibility of Mr and Miss Crawrd's having applied to her uncle and obtained a permission, was giving her ease. This was e letter:—

[292]

"A most scandalous, ill-natured rumour has st reached me, and I write, dear Fanny, to arn you against giving the least credit to it, ould it spread into the country. Depend upon there is some mistake, and that a day or two ill clear it up; at any rate, that Henry is blamess, and in spite of a moment's etourderie, thinks nobody but you. Say not a word of it; hear othing, surmise nothing, whisper nothing, till write again. I am sure it will be all hushed p, and nothing proved but Rushworth's folly. f they are gone, I would lay my life they are nly gone to Mansfield Park, and Julia with nem. But why would not you let us come for ou? I wish you may not repent it.-Yours. ."

Fanny stood aghast. As no scandalous, illatured rumour had reached her, it was impossile for her to understand much of this strange etter. She could only perceive that it must reate to Wimpole Street and Mr Crawford, and [293] only conjecture that something very imprude had just occurred in that quarter to draw to notice of the world, and to excite her jealou in Miss Crawford's apprehension, if she heard Miss Crawford need not be alarmed for h She was only sorry for the parties concerned a for Mansfield, if the report should spread so fa but she hoped it might not. If the Rushwort were gone themselves to Mansfield, as was to inferred from what Miss Crawford said, it w not likely that anything unpleasant should ha preceded them, or at least should make any in pression.

As to Mr Crawford, she hoped it might gi him a knowledge of his own disposition, convin him that he was not capable of being steadily a tached to any one woman in the world, an shame him from persisting any longer in address ing herself.

It was very strange! She had begun to thin he really loved her, and to fancy his affection f her something more than common; and his si ter still said that he cared for nobody else. Y there must have been some marked display of attentions to her cousin, there must have been some strong indiscretion, since her correspondent was not of a sort to regard a slight one.

Very uncomfortable she was, and must continue, till she heard from Miss Crawford again was impossible to banish the letter from her oughts, and she could not relieve herself by eaking of it to any human being. Miss Crawrd need not have urged secrecy with so much armth; she might have trusted to her sense of nat was due to her cousin.

[294]

The next day came and brought no second tter. Fanny was disappointed. She could still ink of little else all the morning; but, when her ther came back in the afternoon with the daily ewspaper as usual, she was so far from expectg any elucidation through such a channeï that e subject was for a moment out of her head.

She was deep in other musing. The rememance of her first evening in that room, of her ther and his newspaper, came across her. No andle was now wanted. The sun was yet an hour nd half above the horizon. She felt that she ad, indeed, been three months there; and the m's rays falling strongly into the parlour inead of cheering, made her still more melanoly, for sunshine appeared to her a totaliy diferent thing in a town and in the country. Here, s power was only a glare: a stifling, sickly glare, erving but to bring forward stains and dirt that ight otherwise have slept. There was neither ealth nor gaiety in sunshine in a town. She at in a blaze of oppressive heat, in a cloud of oving dust, and her eyes could only wender from the walls, marked by her father's here to the table cut and notched by her brother where stood the tea-board never thorough cleaned, the cups and saucers wiped in streat the milk a mixture of motes floating in the blue, and the bread and butter growing ever minute more greasy than even Rebecca's han had first produced it. Her father read his new paper, and her mother lamented over the ragg carpet as usual, while the tea was in preparation and wished Rebecca would mend it; and Fan was first roused by his calling out to her, afthe humphing and considering over a particular pa agraph: "What's the name of your great coust in town, Fan?"

[295]

A moment's recollection enabled her to sa "Rushworth, sir."

"And don't they live in Wimpole Street?" "Yes, sir."

"Then, there's the devil to pay among the that's all! There" (holding out the paper to her "much good may such fine relations do you. don't know what Sir Thomas may think of su matters; he may be too much of the courtier an fine gentleman to like his daughter the less. Bu by G—! if she belonged to me, I'd give her t rope's end as long as I could stand over he A little flogging for man and woman, too, wou be the best way of preventing such things."

[296]

Fanny read to herself that "it was with infinite nearn the newspaper had to announce to the orld a matrimonial fracas in the family of Mr of Wimpole Street; the beautiful Mrs R. nose name had not long been enrolled in the ts of Hymen, and who had promised to become brilliant a leader in the fashionable world, havg quitted her husband's roof in company with e well-known and captivating Mr C., the intiate friend and associate of Mr R., and it was of known even to the editor of the newspaper, hither they were gone."

"It is a mistake, sir," said Fanny, instantly; t must be a mistake, it cannot be true; it must ean some other people."

She spoke from the instinctive wish of delayg shame; she spoke with a resolution which orung from despair, for she spoke what she d not, could not believe herself. It had been e shock of conviction as she read. The truth ushed on her; and how she could have spoken all, how she could even have breathed, was fterwards matter of wonder to herself.

Mr Price cared too little about the report to ake her much answer. "It might be all a lie," e acknowledged; "but so many fine ladies were bing to the devil now-a-days that way, that are was no answering for anybody."

"Indeed, I hope it is not true," said Mrs [297]

Price, plaintively; "it would be so very shockin If I have spoken once to Rebecca about that ca pet, I am sure I have spoke at least a doz times; have not I, Betsey? And it would not ten minutes' work."

The horror of a mind like Fanny's, as it 1 ceived the conviction of such guilt, and beg to take in some part of the misery that must e sue, can hardly be described. At first, it was sort of stupefaction; but every moment w quickening her perception of the horrible ev She could not doubt, she dared not indulge hope, of the paragraph being false. Miss Crav ford's letter, which she had read so often as make every line her own, was in frightful co formity with it. Her eager defence of h brother, her hope of its being hushed up, her ex dent agitation, were all of a piece with som thing very bad; and if there was a woman of character in existence, who could treat as a tri this sin of the first magnitude, who would t to gloss it over, and desire to have it unpunishe she could believe Miss Crawford to be the w man! Now she could see her own mistake as who were gone, or said to be gone. It was n Mr and Mrs Rushworth; it was Mrs Rushwor and Mr Crawford.

Fanny seemed to herself never to have been shocked before. There was no possibility of res e evening passed without a pause of mis-7, the night was totally sleepless. She ssed only from feelings of sickness to shudrings of horror; and from hot fits of fever cold. The event was so shocking, that there re moments even when her heart revolted from as impossible: when she thought it could not be. woman married only six months ago; a man ofessing himself devoted, even engaged to anher; that other her near relation; the whole mily, both families connected as they were by e upon tie; all friends, all intimate together! was too horrible a confusion of guilt, too gross complication of evil, for human nature, not in state of utter barbarism, to be capable of! yet r judgment told her it was so. His unsettled fections, wavering with his vanity, Maria's deded attachment, and no sufficient principle on ther side, gave it possibility: Miss Crawford's tter stampt it a fact.

[298]

What would be the consequence? Whom ould it not injure? Whose views might it not fect? Whose peace would it not cut up for ver? Miss Crawford, herself, Edmund; but it as dangerous, perhaps, to tread such ground. he confined herself, or tried to confine herself, o the simple, indubitable family misery which sust envelope all, if it were indeed a matter f certified guilt and public exposure. The mother's sufferings, the father's; there s paused. Julia's, Tom's, Edmund's; there a y longer pause. They were the two on whom would fall most horribly. Sir Thomas's paren solicitude and high sense of honour and decoru Edmund's upright principles, unsuspicious te per, and genuine strength of feeling, made h think it scarcely possible for them to suppolife and reason under such disgrace; and it a peared to her, that, as far as this world alow was concerned, the greatest blessing to every of of kindred with Mrs Rushworth would be stant annihilation.

[299]

Nothing happened the next day, or the next to weaken her terrors. Two posts came in, a brought no refutation, public or private. The was no second letter to explain away the fi from Miss Crawford; there was no intelliger from Mansfield, though it was now full time f her to hear again from her aunt. This was evil omen. She had, indeed, scarcely the shade of a hope to soothe her mind, and was reduced so low and wan and trembling a condition, as mother, not unkind, except Mrs Price, con have overlooked, when the third day did bri the sickening knock, and a letter was again p into her hands. It bore the London postmat and came from Edmund.

"DEAR FANNY,—You know our press [300]

etchedness. May God support you under your are! We have been here two days, but there is thing to be done. They cannot be traced. You ay not have heard of the last blow-Julia's opement; she is gone to Scotland with Yates. ne left London a few hours before we entered At any other time this would have been felt eadfully. Now it seems nothing; yet it is an avy aggravation. My father is not over-powed. More cannot be hoped. He is still able to ink and act; and I write, by his desire, to proose your returning home. He is anxious to get ou there for my mother's sake. I shall be at ortsmouth the morning after you receive this, nd hope to find you ready to set off for Manseld. My father wishes you to invite Susan to o with you for a few months. Settle it as you ke; say what is proper; I am sure you will feel ach an instance of his kindness at such a moent! Do justice to his meaning, however I ay confuse it. You may imagine something of iy present state. There is no end of the evil let oose upon us. You will see me early by the ail .--- Yours, &c."

Never had Fanny more wanted a cordial. Never had she felt such a one as this letter conained. To-morrow! to leave Portsmouth tonorrow! She was, she felt she was, in the great-[301]

est danger of being exquisitely happy, while many were miserable. The evil which broug such good to her! She dreaded lest she shou learn to be insensible of it. To be going so soo sent for so kindly, sent for as a comfort, an with leave to take Susan, was altogether such combination of blessings as set her heart in glow, and for a time seemed to distance even pain, and make her incapable of suitably sharin the distress even of those whose distress sl thought of most. Julia's elopement could affe her comparatively but little; she was amazed an shocked; but it could not occupy her, could not dwell on her mind. She was obliged to call he self to think of it, and acknowledge it to l terrible and grievous, or it was escaping her, the midst of all the agitating pressing joyf cares attending this summons to herself.

There is nothing like employment, active in dispensable employment, for relieving sorrow Employment, even melancholy, may dispel me ancholy, and her occupations were hopeful. Sh had so much to do, that not even the horribistory of Mrs Rushworth (now fixed to the las point of certainty) could affect her as it ha done before. She had not time to be miserable Within twenty-four hours she was hoping to be gone; her father and mother must be spoken to Susan prepared, everything got ready. Bus ss followed business; the day was hardly long ough. The happiness she was imparting, too, ppiness very little alloyed by the black comunication which must briefly precede it—the yful consent of her father and mother to usan's going with her—the general satisfaction ith which the going of both seemed regarded, ad the ecstasy of Susan herself, was all serving support her spirits.

[302]

The affliction of the Bertrams was little felt the family. Mrs Price talked of her poor sisr for a few minutes, but how to find anything hold Susan's clothes, because Rebecca took way all the boxes and spoilt them, was much ore in her thoughts: and as for Susan, now nexpectedly gratified in the first wish of her eart, and knowing nothing personally of those ho had sinned, or of those who were sorrowing -if she could help rejoicing from beginning to nd, it was as much as ought to be expected from uman virtue at fourteen.

As nothing was really left for the decision of Irs Price, or the good offices of Rebecca, everying was rationally and duly accomplished, and he girls were ready for the morrow. The advanage of much sleep to prepare them for their burney was impossible. The cousin who was ravelling towards them could hardly have less han visited their agitated spirits, one all happiness, the other all varying and indescribable pe turbation.

[303]

By eight in the morning Edmund was in the house. The girls heard his entrance from above and Fanny went down. The idea of immediately seeing him, with the knowledge of whe he must be suffering, brought back all her ow first feelings. He so near her, and in miser She was ready to sink as she entered the parlou He was alone, and met her instantly; and sh found herself pressed to his heart with only thes words, just articulate, "My Fanny, my only si ter; my only comfort now!" She could say noth ing; nor for some minutes could he say more.

He turned away to recover himself, and when he spoke again, though his voice still faltered his manner showed the wish of self-command and the resolution of avoiding any farther allusion. "Have you breakfasted? When shall yo be ready? Does Susan go?" were questions for lowing each other rapidly. His great object was to be off as soon as possible. When Mansfiel was considered, time was precious; and the stat of his own mind made him find relief only i motion. It was settled that he should order the carriage to the door in half an hour. Fanny an swered for their having breakfasted and being quite ready in half an hour. He had already ate and declined staying for their meal. He would

[304]

Ilk round the ramparts, and join them with the rriage. He was gone again; glad to get away en from Fanny.

He looked very ill; evidently suffering under olent emotions, which he was determined to ppress. She knew it must be so, but it was terole to her.

The carriage came; and he entered the house gain at the same moment, just in time to spend few minutes with the family, and be a witness but that he saw nothing—of the tranquil maner in which the daughters were parted with, and ast in time to prevent their sitting down to the reakfast table, which by dint of much unusual trivity, was quite and completely ready as the crriage drove from the door. Fanny's last meal her father's house was in character with her est; she was dismissed from it as hospitably as he had been welcomed.

How her heart swelled with joy and gratitude she passed the barriers of Portsmouth, and ow Susan's face wore its broadest smiles, may e easily conceived. Sitting forwards, however, and screened by her bonnet, those smiles were enseen.

The journey was likely to be a silent one. Edund's deep sighs often reached Fanny. Had e been alone with her, his heart must have pened in spite of every resolution; but Susan's presence drove him quite into himself, and h attempts to talk on indifferent subjects coul never be long supported.

[305]

Fanny watched him with never-failing solic tude, and sometimes catching his eye, revived a affectionate smile, which comforted her; but th first day's journey passed without her hearing word from him on the subjects that were weigh ing him down. The next morning produced little more. Just before their setting out from Oxford, while Susan was stationed at a window in eager observation of the departure of a large family from the inn, the other two were stand ing by the fire; and Edmund, particularly struc by the alteration in Fanny's looks, and from h ignorance of the daily evils of her father house, attributing an undue share of the change attributing all to the recent event, took her hand and said in a low, but very expressive tone, "N wonder-you must feel it-you must suffe How a man who had once loved, could deser you! But yours-your regard was new com pared with-Fanny, think of me!"

The first division of their journey occupied long day, and brought them, almost knocked up to Oxford; but the second was over at a muc earlier hour. They were in the environs of Mans field long before the usual dinner-time, and a they approached the beloved place, the hearts o oth sisters sank a little. Fanny began to dread he meeting with her aunts and Tom, under so readful a humiliation; and Susan to feel with ome anxiety, that all her best manners, all her ately acquired knowledge of what was practised ere, was on the point of being called into action. visions of good and ill breeding, of old vulgarsms and new gentilities were before her; and she vas meditating much upon silver forks, napkins, nd finger glasses. Fanny had been everywhere wake to the difference of the country since Febuary; but when they entered the Park her pereptions and her pleasures were of the keenest ort. It was three months, full three months, ince her quitting it, and the change was from vinter to summer. Her eye fell everywhere on awns and plantations of the freshest green; and he trees, though not fully clothed, were in that lelightful state when farther beauty is known o be at hand, and when, while much is actually riven to the sight, more yet remains for the imgination. Her enjoyment, however, was for nerself alone. Edmund could not share it. She ooked at him, but he was leaning back, sunk in deeper gloom than ever, and with eyes closed, is if the view of cheerfulness oppressed him, and the lovely scenes of home must be shut out. It made her melancholy again; and the knowl-

[306]

dge of what must be enduring there, invested

[307]

even the house, modern, airy, and well situated as it was, with a melancholy aspect.

By one of the suffering party within, they were expected with such impatience as she had never known before. Fanny had scarcely passed the solemn-looking servants, when Lady Bertram came from the drawing-room to meet her came with no indolent step; and falling on her neck, said, "Dear Fanny! now I shall be comfortable."

CHAPTER XLVII.

T had been a miserable party, each of the three believing themselves most miserable Mrs Norris, however, as most attached to Maria, was really the greatest sufferer. Maria was her first favourite, the dearest of all; the match had been her own contriving, as she had been wont with such pride of heart to feel and say, and this conclusion of it almost overpowered her.

She was an altered creature, quieted, stupefied indifferent to everything that passed. The being left with her sister and nephew, and all the house under her care, had been an advantage entirely thrown away; she had been unable to direct or dictate, or even fancy herself useful

[308]

Then really touched by affliction, her active owers had been all benumbed; and neither Lady ertram nor Tom had received from her the nallest support or attempt at support. She had one no more for them than they had done for ach other. They had been all solitary, helpless, nd forlorn alike; and now the arrival of the thers only established her superiority in wretchlness. Her companions were relieved, but there as no good for her. Edmund was almost as elcome to his brother as Fanny to her aunt; but Irs Norris, instead of having comfort from ther, was but the more irritated by the sight of he person whom, in the blindness of her anger, he could have charged as the dæmon of the piece. Iad Fanny accepted Mr Crawford this could ot have happened.

Susan, too, was a grievance. She had not pirits to notice her in more than a few repulsive poks, but she felt her as a spy, and an intruder, nd an indigent niece, and everything most odious. By her other aunt, Susan was received with uiet kindness. Lady Bertram could not give er much time, or many words, but she felt her, s Fanny's sister, to have a claim at Mansfield, nd was ready to kiss and like her; and Susan was more than satisfied, for she came perfectly ware that nothing but ill humour was to be xpected from aunt Norris; and was so provided with happiness, so strong in that best o blessings, an escape from many certain evils that she could have stood against a great dea more indifference than she met with from th others.

[ 309 ]

She was now left a good deal to herself, to get acquainted with the house and grounds a she could, and spent her days very happily in so doing, while those who might otherwise hav attended to her were shut up, or wholly occupied each with the person quite dependant on them at this time, for everything like comfort; Ed mund trying to bury his own feelings in exertions for the relief of his brother's, and Fanny devoted to her aunt Bertram, returning to every former office with more than former zeal, and thinking she could never do enough for one who seemed so much to want her.

To talk over the dreadful business with Fanny, talk and lament, was all Lady Bertram' consolation. To be listened to and borne with and hear the voice of kindness and sympathy in return, was everything that could be done fo her. To be otherwise comforted was out of th question. The case admitted of no comfort Lady Bertram did not think deeply, but, guided by Sir Thomas, she thought justly on all im portant points; and she saw therefore, in all it enormity, what had happened, and neither en eavoured herself, nor required Fanny to adse her, to think little of guilt and infamy.

[310]

Her affections were not acute, nor was her ind tenacious. After a time, Fanny found it ot impossible to direct her thoughts to other abjects, and revive some interest in the usual ecupations; but whenever Lady Bertram was xed on the event, she could see it only in one ght, as comprehending the loss of a daughter, and a disgrace never to be wiped off.

Fanny learnt from her all the particulars hich had yet transpired. Her aunt was no very nethodical narrator, but with the help of some etters to and from Sir Thomas, and what she bready knew herself, and could reasonably ombine, she was soon able to understand quite is much as she wished of the circumstances atending the story.

Mrs Rushworth had gone, for the Easter hollays, to Twickenham, with a family whom she ad just grown intimate with: a family of lively, greeable manners, and probably of morals and iscretion to suit, for to their house Mr Craword had constant access at all times. His havng been in the same neighbourhood Fanny aleady knew. Mr Rushworth had been gone at his time to Bath, to pass a few days with his nother, and bring her back to town, and Maria was with these friends without any restraint, without even Julia; for Julia had removed from Wimpole Street two or three weeks before, or a visit to some relations of Sir Thomas; a re moval which her father and mother were now disposed to attribute to some view of conven ience on Mr Yates's account. Very soon after th Rushworths' return to Wimpole Street, Si Thomas had received a letter from an old and most particular friend in London, who hearing and witnessing a good deal to alarm him in tha quarter, wrote to recommend Sir Thomas's com ing to London himself, and using his influence with his daughter to put an end to the intimac which was already exposing her to unpleasan remarks, and evidently making Mr Rushwort uneasy.

[311]

Sir Thomas was preparing to act upon thi letter, without communicating its contents t any creature at Mansfield, when it was followed by another, sent express from the same friend to break to him the almost desperate situation in which affairs then stood with the young people. Mrs Rushworth had left her husband house: Mr Rushworth had been in great angeand distress to him (Mr Harding) for his advice; Mr Harding feared there had been at leas very flagrant indiscretion. The maidservant o Mrs Rushworth, senior, threatened alarmingly He was doing all in his power to quiet every [312] ing, with the hope of Mrs Rushworth's rerrn, but was so much counteracted in Wimpole treet by the influence of Mr Rushworth's other, that the worst consequences might be pprehended.

This dreadful communication could not be ept from the rest of the family. Sir Thomas et off, Edmund would go with him, and the thers had been left in a state of wretchedness, ferior only to what followed the receipt of the ext letters from London. Everything was by nat time public beyond a hope. The servant of Irs Rushworth, the mother, had exposure in er power, and supported by her mistress, was ot to be silenced. The two ladies, even in the hort time they had been together, had disagreed; nd the bitterness of the elder against her daugher-in-law might perhaps arise almost as much rom the personal disrespect with which she had erself been treated as from sensibility for her on.

However that might be, she was unmanageble. But had she been less obstinate, or of less weight with her son, who was always guided by he last speaker, by the person who could get old of and shut him up, the case would still ave been hopeless, for Mrs Rushworth did not ppear again, and there was every reason to onclude her to be concealed somewhere with Mr

[313]

Crawford, who had quitted his uncle's house, for a journey, on the very day of her absentir herself.

Sir Thomas, however, remained yet a litt longer in town, in the hope of discovering an snatching her from farther vice, though all w lost on the side of character.

His present state Fanny could hardly bear think of. There was but one of his children whether whether the second s was not at this time a source of misery to him Tom's complaints had been greatly heighten by the shock of his sister's conduct, and his r covery so much thrown back by it, that eve Lady Bertram had been struck by the difference and all her alarms were regularly sent off to h husband; and Julia's elopement, the addition blow which had met him on his arrival in Londo though its force had been deadened at the m ment, must, she knew, be sorely felt. She sa that it was. His letters expressed how much deplored it. Under any circumstances it wou have been an unwelcome alliance; but to ha it so clandestinely formed, and such a period chosen for its completion, placed Julia's feelin in a most unfavourable light, and severely aggr vated the folly of her choice. He called it a ba thing, done in the worst manner, and at the wor time; and though Julia was yet as more pardo able than Maria as folly than vice, he could n t regard the step she had taken as opening the orst probabilities of a conclusion hereafter like r sister's. Such was his opinion of the set into ich she had thrown herself.

[314]

Fanny felt for him most acutely. He could ve no comfort but in Edmund. Every other ild must be racking his heart. His displeasure ainst herself she trusted, reasoning differently om Mrs Norris, would now be done away. She ould be justified. Mr Crawford would have lly acquitted her conduct in refusing him; but is, though most material to herself, would be or consolation to Sir Thomas. Her uncle's spleasure was terrible to her; but what could r justification or her gratitude and attachent do for him? His stay must be on Edmund one.

She was mistaken, however, in supposing that dmund gave his father no present pain. It was a much less poignant nature than what the hers excited; but Sir Thomas was considering s happiness as very deeply involved in the ofnce of his sister and friend; cut off by it, as he ust be, from the woman whom he had been irsuing with undoubted attachment and strong obability of success; and who, in everything at this despicable brother, would have been so igible a connexion. He was aware of what Edund must be suffering on his own behalf, in addition to all the rest, when they were in town he had seen or conjectured his feelings; an having reason to think that one interview wi Miss Crawford had taken place, from whice Edmund derived only increased distress, has been as anxious on that account as on others get him out of town, and had engaged him taking Fanny home to her aunt, with a view his relief and benefit, no less than theirs. Fann was not in the secret of her uncle's feelings, S Thomas not in the secret of Miss Crawford character. Had he been privy to her converstion with his son, he would not have wished her to belong to him, though her twenty thousan pounds had been forty.

[315]

That Edmund must be for ever divided from Miss Crawford did not admit of a doubt with Fanny; and yet, till she knew that he felt the same, her own conviction was insufficient. She thought he did, but she wanted to be assured of it. If he would now speak to her with the un reserve which had sometimes been too much for her before, it would be most consoling; but the she found was not to be. She seldom caw him never alone. He probably avoided being alon with her. What was to be inferred? That he judgment submitted to all his own peculiar an bitter share of this family affliction, but that was too keenly felt to be a subject of the slight communication. This must be his state. He elded, but it was with agonies which did not mit of speech. Long, long would it be ere iss Crawford's name passed his lips again, or e could hope for a renewal of such confidential aercourse as had been.

[316]

It was long. They reached Mansfield on ursday, and it was not till Sunday evening at Edmund began to talk to her on the subject. tting with her on Sunday evening-a wet Suny evening-the very time of all others when, a friend is at hand, the heart must be opened, d everything told; no one else in the room, expt his mother, who, after hearing an affecting rmon, had cried herself to sleep, it was imposle not to speak; and so, with the usual beginngs, hardly to be traced as to what came first, d the usual declaration that if she would listen him for a few minutes, he should be very brief, d certainly never tax her kindness in the same ay again; she need not fear a repetition; it ould be a subject prohibited entirely: he entered oon the luxury of relating circumstances and nsations of the first interest to himself, to one whose affectionate sympathy he was quite nvinced.

How Fanny listened, with what curiosity and ncern, what pain and what delight, how the gitation of his voice was watched, and how carefully her own eyes were fixed on any object h himself, may be imagined. The opening w alarming. He had seen Miss Crawford. He h been invited to see her. He had received a no from Lady Stornaway to beg him to call; a regarding it as what was meant to be the la last interview of friendship, and investing h with all the feelings of shame and wretchedne which Crawford's sister ought to have known, had gone to her in such a state of mind, so so ened, so devoted, as made it for a few moment impossible to Fanny's fears that it should be t last. But as he proceeded in his story, these fea were over. She had met him, he said, with a se ious-certainly a serious-even an agitated a but before he had been able to speak one intel gible sentence, she had introduced the subject a manner which he owned had shocked him. " heard you were in town,' said she; 'I wanted see you. Let us talk over this sad business. Wh can equal the folly of our two relations?' I cou not answer, but I believe my looks spoke. S felt reproved. Sometimes how quick to fee With a graver look and voice she then added, do not mean to defend Henry at your sister expense.' So she began, but how she went o Fanny, is not fit, is hardly fit to be repeated you. I cannot recall all her words. I would n dwell upon them if I could. Their substance w eat anger at the folly of each. She reprobated r brother's folly in being drawn on by a woan whom he had never cared for, to do what ust lose him the woman he adored; but still ore the folly of poor Maria, in sacrificing such situation, plunging into such difficulties, under e idea of being really loved by a man who had ng ago made his indifference clear. Guess what must have felt. To hear the woman whom—. o harsher name than folly given! So voluntar-7, so freely, so coolly to canvass it! No reluctnce, no horror, no feminine, shall I say, no modt loathings? This is what the world does. For here, Fanny, shall we find a woman whom naare had so richly endowed? Spoilt, spoilt!"

[317]

[318]

After a little reflection, he went on with a sort of desperate calmness. "I will tell you everying, and then have done for ever. She saw it have a folly, and that folly stamped only by exosure. The want of common discretion, of cauon; his going down to Richmond for the whole me of her being at Twickenham; her putting erself in the power of a servant; it was the deection, in short—oh, Fanny! it was the detection, of the offence, which she reprobated. It was he imprudence which had brought things to exremity, and obliged her brother to give up every earer plan in order to fly with her."

He stopt. "And what," said Fanny (believ-[319] ing herself required to speak), "what could yo say?"

"Nothing, nothing to be understood. I we like a man stunned. She went on, began to tak of you; yes, then she began to talk of you, r gretting, as well she might, the loss of such a-There she spoke very rationally. But she has a ways done justice to you. 'He has thrown away said she, 'such a woman as he will never see agai She would have fixed him; she would have mad him happy for ever.' My dearest Fanny, I a giving you, I hope, more pleasure than pain h this retrospect of what might have been—bu what never can be now. You do not wish me be silent? If you do, give me but a look, a wor and I have done."

No look or word was given.

"Thank God," said he. "We were all dispose to wonder, but seems to have been the mercif appointment of Providence that the heart which knew no guile should not suffer. She spoke of you with high praise and warm affection; you even here, there was alloy, a dash of evil; for the midst of it she could exclaim, 'Why wou not she have him? It is all her fault. Simple gin I shall never forgive her. Had she accepted hi as she ought, they might now have been on the point of marriage, and Henry would have been too happy and too busy to want any other object

[320]

e would have taken no pains to be on terms th Mrs Rushworth again. It would have all ded in a regular standing flirtation, in yearly eetings at Sotherton and Everingham.' Could ou have believed it possible? But the charm is oken. My eyes are opened."

"Cruel!" said Fanny, "quite cruel. At such a oment to give way to gaiety, to speak with htness, and to you! Absolute cruelty."

"Cruelty, do you call it? We differ there. No, rs is not a cruel nature. I do not consider her meaning to wound my feelings. The evil lies t deeper; in her total ignorance, unsuspiciousess of there being such feelings; in a perversion mind which made it natural to her to treat e subject as she did. She was speaking only as e had been used to hear others speak, as e imagined every body else would speak. Hers e not faults of temper. She would not volunrily give unnecessary pain to any one, and ough I may deceive myself, I cannot but think at for me, for my feelings, she would-. Hers e faults of principle, Fanny; of blunted delicy and a corrupted, vitiated mind. Perhaps is best for me, since it leaves me so little to gret. Not so, however. Gladly would I subit to all the increased pain of losing her, rather an have to think of her as I do. I told her so." "Did you?"

"Yes; when I left her I told her so." "How long were you together?"

"Five-and-twenty minutes. Well, she went of to say, that what remained now to be done was bring about a marriage between them. She spol of it, Fanny, with a steadier voice than I can He was obliged to pause more than once as continued. " 'We must persuade Henry to mar her,' said she; 'and what with honour, and t certainty of having shut himself out for ev from Fanny, I do not despair of it. Fanny must give up. I do not think that even he cou now hope to succeed with one of her stamp, an therefore I hope we may find no insuperable di ficulty. My influence, which is not small, shall a go that way; and when once married, and pro erly supported by her own family, people of r spectability as they are, she may recover her foo ing in society to a certain degree. In some circle we know, she would never be admitted, but wi good dinners, and large parties, there will alway be those who will be glad of her acquaintanc and there is, undoubtedly, more liberality an candour on those points than formerly. Wh I advise is, that your father be quiet. Do n let him injure his own cause by interference. by any officious exertions of his, she is induce to leave Henry's protection, there will be mue less chance of his marrying her than if she r ain with him. I know how he is likely to be fluenced. Let Sir Thomas trust to his honour ad compassion, and it may all end well; but if get his daughter away, it will be destroying e chief hold."

[322]

After repeating this, Edmund was so much fected that Fanny, watching him with silent, it most tender concern, was almost sorry that e subject had been entered on at all. It was ng before he could speak again. At last, "Now, anny," said he, "I shall soon have done. I have old you the substance of all that she said. As oon as I could speak, I replied that I had not pposed it possible, coming in such a state of ind into that house as I had done, that anything ould occur to make me suffer more, but that she ad been inflicting deeper wounds in almost every entence. That though I had, in the course of ur acquaintance, been often sensible of some ifference in our opinions, on points, too, of some noment, it had not entered my imagination to onceive the difference could be such as she had ow proved it. That the manner in which she eated the dreadful crime committed by her rother and my sister (with whom lay the greater eduction I pretended not to say), but the maner in which she spoke of the crime itself, giving every reproach but the right; considering its l consequences only as they were to be braved or overborne by a defiance of decency and in pudence in wrong; and last of all, and above a recommending to us a compliance, a compromis an acquiescence, in the continuance of the si on the chance of a marriage which, thinking as now thought of her brother, should rather be pr vented than sought; all this together most griev ously convinced me that I had never understoo her before, and that, as far as related to mine it had been the creature of my own imagination not Miss Crawford, that I had been too apt t dwell on for many months past. That, perhaps it was best for me; I had less to regret in sacr ficing a friendship, feelings, hopes which must at any rate, have been torn from me now. An yet, that I must, and would confess, that, coul I have restored her to what she had appeared t me before, I would infinitely prefer any increas of the pain of parting, for the sake of carrying with me the right of tenderness and esteem. This is what I said, the purport of it; but, as you may imagine, not spoken so collectedly or methodi cally as I have repeated it to you. She was aston ished, exceedingly astonished-more than aston ished. I saw her change countenance. She turned extremely red. I imagined I saw a mixture of many feelings: a great, though short struggle half a wish of yielding to truths, half a sense of shame, but habit, habit carried it. She would have ughed if she could. It was a sort of laugh, as e answered, 'A pretty good lecture, upon my ord. Was it part of your last sermon? At this ate you will soon reform everybody at Manseld and Thornton Lacey; and when I hear of ou next, it may be as a celebrated preacher in ome great society of Methodists, or as a misonary into foreign parts.' She tried to speak arelessly, but she was not so careless as she vanted to appear. I only said in reply, that from ny heart I wished her well, and earnestly hoped hat she might soon learn to think more justly, nd not owe the most valuable knowledge we ould any of us acquire, the knowledge of ourelves and of our duty, to the lessons of affliction, nd immediately left the room. I had gone a few teps, Fanny, when I heard the door open behind ne. 'Mr Bertram,' said she. I looked back. 'Mr Bertram,' said she, with a smile; but it was a mile ill-suited to the conversation that had bassed, a saucy playful smile, seeming to invite n order to subdue me; at least it appeared so to ne. I resisted; it was the impulse of the moment o resist, and still walked on. I have since, someimes, for a moment, regretted that I did not go back, but I know I was right, and such has been he end of our acquaintance. And what an acuaintance has it been! How have I been deeived! Equally in brother and sister deceived!

[323]

[324]

[325]

I thank you for your patience, Fanny. This has been the greatest relief, and now we will hav done."

And such was Fanny's dependence on h words, that for five minutes she though they had done. Then, however, it all cam on again, or something very like it, an nothing less than Lady Bertram's rousin thoroughly up, could really close such conversation. Till that happened, they con tinued to talk of Miss Crawford alone, an how she had attached him, and how delightfu nature had made her, and how excellent she woul have been, had she fallen into good hands earlier Fanny, now at liberty to speak openly, felt mor than justified in adding to his knowledge of he real character, by some hint of what share hi brother's state of health might be supposed t have in her wish for a complete reconciliation This was not an agreeable intimation. Natur resisted it for a while. It would have been a vas deal pleasanter to have had her more disinter ested in her attachment; but his vanity was no of a strength to fight long against reason. H submitted to believe that Tom's illness had influ enced her, only reserving for himself this con soling thought, that considering the many coun teractions of opposing habits, she had certainly been more attached to him than could have been xpected, and for his sake been more near doing ight. Fanny thought exactly the same; and ney were also quite agreed in their opinion of he lasting effect, the indelible impression, which uch a disappointment must make on his mind. Time would undoubtedly abate somewhat of is sufferings, but still it was a sort of thing which he never could get entirely the better of; and as to his ever meeting with any other woman who could, it was too impossible to be named but with indignation. Fanny's friendship was all hat he had to cling to.

[326]

CHAPTER XLVIII.

ET other pens dwell on guilt and misery. I quit such odious subjects as soon as I can, impatient to restore everybody, not greatly in fault themselves, to tolerable comort, and to have done with all the rest.

My Fanny, indeed, at this very time, I have he satisfaction of knowing, must have been happy in spite of everything. She must have been a happy creature in spite of all that she fielt, or thought she felt, for the distress of those around her. She had sources of delight that nust force their way. She was returned to Mansfield Park, she was useful, she was beloved she was safe from Mr Crawford; and when Si Thomas came back she had every proof tha could be given in his then melancholy state or spirits, of his perfect approbation and increased regard; and happy as all this must make her, she would still have been happy without any of it for Edmund was no longer the dupe of Miss Crawford.

[327]

It is true that Edmund was very far from happy himself. He was suffering from disap pointment and regret, grieving over what was and wishing for what could never be. She knew it was so, and was sorry; but it was with a sor row so founded on satisfaction, so tending to ease, and so much in harmony with every dearest sensation, that there are few who might not have been glad to exchange their greatest gaiety for it

Sir Thomas, poor Sir Thomas, a parent, and conscious of errors in his own conduct as a par ent, was the longest to suffer. He felt that he ought not to have allowed the marriage; that his daughter's sentiments had been sufficiently known to him to render him culpable in author ising it; that in so doing he had sacrificed the right to the expedient, and been governed by motives of selfishness and worldly wisdom. These were reflections that required some time to soften but time will do almost everything; and [328] ough little comfort arose on Mrs Rushworth's de for the misery she had occasioned, comfort as to be found greater than he had supposed in is other children. Julia's match became a less esperate business than he had considered it at rst. She was humble, and wishing to be foriven; and Mr Yates, desirous of being really eceived into the family, was disposed to look up him and be guided. He was not very solid; ut there was a hope of his becoming less triffing, f his being at least tolerably domestic and quiet; nd at any rate, there was comfort in finding his state rather more, and his debts much less, than e had feared, and in being consulted and treated s the friend best worth attending to. There was omfort also in Tom, who gradually regained his ealth, without regaining the thoughtlessness and elfishness of his previous habits. He was the etter for ever for his illness. He had suffered, nd he had learned to think: two advantages that e had never known before; and the self-reproach rising from the deplorable event in Wimpole street, to which he felt himself accessory by all he dangerous intimacy of his unjustifiable theare, made an impression on his mind which, at he age of six-and-twenty, with no want of sense r good companions, was durable in its happy ffects. He became what he ought to be: useful o his father, steady and quiet, and not living nerely for himself.

Here was comfort indeed! and quite as soon a Sir Thomas could place dependence on suc sources of good, Edmund was contributing t his father's ease by improvement in the only point in which he had given him pain before: im provement in his spirits. After wandering about and sitting under trees with Fanny all the sum mer evenings, he had so well talked his mind int submission, as to be very tolerably cheerfu again.

These were the circumstances and the hope which gradually brought their alleviation to Si Thomas, deadening his sense of what was lost and in part reconciling him to himself; though the anguish arising from the conviction of hi own errors in the education of his daughters was never to be entirely done away.

Too late he became aware how unfavourable to the character of any young people must be the totally opposite treatment which Maria and Julia had been always experiencing at home where the excessive indulgence and flattery of their aunt had been continually contrasted with his own severity. He saw how ill he had judged in expecting to counteract what was wrong in Mrs Norris, by its reverse in himself; clearly saw that he had but increased the evil, by teaching them to repress their spirits in his presence [so]* * Omitted in the early editions.

[330]

as to make their real disposition unknown to him, and sending them for all their indulgences to a person who had been able to attach them only by the blindness of her affection, and the excess of her praise.

Here had been grievous mismanagement; but, bad as it was, he gradually grew to feel that it had not been the most direful mistake in his plan of education. Something must have been wanting within, or time would have worn away much of its ill effect. He feared that principle, active principle, had been wanting; that they had never been properly taught to govern their inclinations and tempers, by that sense of duty which can alone suffice. They had been instructed theoretically in their religion, but never required to bring it into daily practice. To be distinguished for elegance and accomplishments, the authorised object of their youth, could have had no useful influence that way, no moral effect on the mind. He had meant them to be good, but his cares had been directed to the understanding and manners, not the disposition; and of the necessity of self-denial and humility, he feared they had never heard from any lips that could profit them.

Bitterly did he deplore a deficiency which now he could scarcely comprehend to have been possible. Wretchedly did he feel, that with all the cost and care of an anxious and expensive education, he had brought up his daughters without their understanding their first duties, or his being acquainted with their character and temper

[331]

The high spirit and strong passions of Mrs Rushworth, especially, were made known to him only in their sad result. She was not to be prevailed on to leave Mr Crawford. She hoped to marry him, and they continued together till she was obliged to be convinced that such hope was vain, and till the disappointment and wretched ness arising from the conviction rendered her temper so bad, and her feelings for him so like hatred, as to make them for a while each other's punishment, and then induce a voluntary separation.

She had lived with him to be reproached as the ruin of all his happiness in Fanny, and carried away no better consolation in leaving him than that she had divided them. What can exceed the misery of such a mind in such a situation?

Mr Rushworth had no difficulty in procuring a divorce; and so ended a marriage contracted under such circumstances as to make any better end the effect of good luck not to be reckoned on. She had despised him, and loved another and he had been very much aware that it was so The indignities of stupidity, and the disappointnents of selfish passion, can excite little pity. His punishment followed his conduct, as did a leeper punishment the deeper guilt of his wife. He was released from the engagement to be morified and unhappy, till some other pretty girl could attract him into matrimony again, and he night set forward on a second, and it is to be noped, more prosperous trial of the state: if huped, to be duped at least with good humour and good luck; while she must withdraw with infintely stronger feelings to a retirement and reproach which could allow no second spring of hope or character.

[332]

Where she could be placed became a subject of most melancholy and momentous consultation. Mrs Norris, whose attachment seemed to augment with the demerits of her niece, would have had her received at home, and countenanced by them all. Sir Thomas would not hear of it; and Mrs Norris's anger against Fanny was so much the greater, from considering her residence there as the motive. She persisted in placing his scruples to her account, though Sir Thomas very solemnly assured her that, had there been no young woman in question, had there been no young person of either sex belonging to him, to be endangered by the society or hurt by the character of Mrs Rushworth, he would never have offered so great an insult to the neighbourhood as to expect it to notice her. As a daughter, he hoped a penitent one, she should be protected by him, and secured in every comfort, and supported by every encouragement to do right, which their relative situations admitted; but farther than that he could not go. Maria had destroyed her own character, and he would not, by a vain attempt to restore what never could be restored, by affording his sanction to vice, or in seeking to lessen its disgrace, be anywise accessory to introducing such misery in another man's family, as he had known himself.

[333]

It ended in Mrs Norris's resolving to quit Mansfield, and devote herself to her unfortunate Maria, and in an establishment being formed for them in another country, remote and private, where, shut up together with little society, on one side no affection, on the other no judgment, it may be reasonably supposed that their tempers became their mutual punishment. Mrs Norris's removal from Mansfield was the great supplementary comfort of Sir Thomas's life. His opinion of her had been sinking from the day of his return from Antigua: in every transaction together from that period, in their daily intercourse, in business, or in chat, she had been regularly losing ground in his esteem, and convincing him that either time had done her much disservice, or that he had considerably over-rated her sense, and wonderfully borne with her manhers before. He had felt her as an hourly evil, which was so much the worse, as there seemed no chance of its ceasing but with life; she seemed a part of himself that must be borne for ever. To be relieved from her, therefore, was so great a felicity that, had she not left bitter remembrances behind her, there might have been danger of his learning almost to approve the evil which produced such a good.

[334]

She was regretted by no one at Mansfield. She had never been able to attach even those she loved best, and since Mrs Rushworth's elopement, her temper had been in a state of such irritation as to make her every where tormenting. Not even Fanny had tears for aunt Norris, not even when she was gone for ever.

That Julia escaped better than Maria was owing, in some measure, to a favourable difference of disposition and circumstance, but in a greater to her having been less the darling of that very aunt, less flattered and less spoilt. Her beauty and acquirements had held but a second place. She had been always used to think herself a little inferior to Maria. Her temper was naturally the easiest of the two; her feelings, though quick, were more controulable, and education had not given her so very hurtful a degree of self-consequence.

She had submitted the best to the disappointment in Henry Crawford. After the first bitterness of the conviction of being slighted was over, she had been tolerably soon in a fair way of not thinking of him again; and when the acquaintance was renewed in town, and Mr Rushworth's house became Crawford's object, she had had the merit of withdrawing herself from it, and of chusing that time to pay a visit to her other friends, in order to secure herself from being again too much attracted. This had been her motive in going to her cousin's. Mr Yates's convenience had had nothing to do with it. She had been allowing his attentions some time, but with very little idea of ever accepting him; and had not her sister's conduct burst forth as it did, and her increased dread of her father and of home, on that event, imagining its certain consequence to herself would be greater severity and restraint, made her hastily resolve on avoiding such immediate horrors at all risks, it is probable that Mr Yates would never have succeeded. She had not eloped with any worse feelings than those of selfish alarm. It had appeared to her the only thing to be done. Maria's guilt had induced Julia's folly.

Henry Crawford, ruined by early independence and bad domestic example, indulged in the freaks of a cold-blooded vanity a little too long.

[336]

Once it had, by an opening undesigned and unnerited, led him into the way of happiness. Could he have been satisfied with the conquest of one amiable woman's affections, could he have found sufficient exultation in overcoming the reuctance, in working himself into the esteem and tenderness of Fanny Price, there would have been every probability of success and felicity for him. His affection had already done something. Her influence over him had already given him some influence over her. Would he have deserved more, there can be no doubt that more would have been obtained, especially when that marriage had taken place, which would have given him the assistance of her conscience in subduing her first inclination, and brought them very often together. Would he have persevered, and uprightly, Fanny must have been his reward, and a reward very voluntarily bestowed, within a reasonable period from Edmund's marrying Mary. Had he done as he intended, and as he knew he ought, by going down to Everingham after his return from Portsmouth, he might have been deciding his own happy destiny. But he was pressed to stay for Mrs Fraser's party; his staying was made of flattering consequence, and he was to meet Mrs Rushworth there. Curiosity and vanity were both engaged, and the temptation of immediate pleasure was too strong for a mind [337] unused to make any sacrifice to right: he resolved to defer his Norfolk journey, resolved that writing should answer the purpose of it, or that its purpose was unimportant, and staid. He saw Mrs Rushworth, was received by her with a coldness which ought to have been repulsive, and have established apparent indifference between them for ever; but he was mortified, he could not bear to be thrown off by the woman whose smiles had been so wholly at his command; he must exert himself to subdue so proud a display of resentment; it was anger on Fanny's account; he must get the better of it, and make Mrs Rushworth Maria Bertram again in her treatment of himself.

In this spirit he began the attack, and by animated perseverance had soon re-established the sort of familiar intercourse, of gallantry, of flirtation, which bounded his views; but in triumphing over the discretion which, though beginning in anger, might have saved them both, he had put himself in the power of feelings on her side more strong than he had supposed. She loved him; there was no withdrawing attentions avowedly dear to her. He was entangled by his own vanity, with as little excuse of love as possible, and without the smallest inconstancy of mind towards her cousin. To keep Fanny and the Beitrams from a knowledge of what was passing became his first object. Secrecy could not have en more desirable for Mrs Rushworth's credit an he felt it for his own. When he returned om Richmond, he would have been glad to see rs Rushworth no more. All that followed was e result of her imprudence, and he went off ith her at last, because he could not help it, recetting Fanny even at the moment, but regretng her infinitely more when all the bustle of the intrigue was over, and a very few months had ught him, by the force of contrast, to place a et higher value on the sweetness of her temper, he purity of her mind, and the excellence of her rinciples.

[338]

That punishment, the public punishment of isgrace, should in a just measure attend his nare of the offence is, we know, not one of the arriers which society gives to virtue. In this orld the penalty is less equal than could be ished; but without presuming to look forward a juster appointment hereafter, we may fairly onsider a man of sense, like Henry Crawford, be providing for himself no small portion of exation and regret; vexation that must rise metimes to self-reproach, and regret to wretchlness, in having so requited hospitality, so inured family peace, so forfeited his best, most stimable, and endeared acquaintance, and so lost ne woman whom he had rationally as well as pasonately loved.

After what had passed to wound and alienate the two families, the continuance of the Bertrams and Grants in such close neighbourhood would have been most distressing; but the absence of the latter, for some months purposely lengthened, ended very fortunately in the necessity, or at least the practicability, of a permanent removal Dr Grant, through an interest on which he had almost ceased to form hopes, succeeded to a stall in Westminster, which, as affording an occasion for leaving Mansfield, an excuse for residence in London, and an increase of income to answer the expenses of the change, was highly acceptable to those who went and those who staid.

Mrs Grant, with a temper to love and be loved, must have gone with some regret from the scenes and people she had been used to; but the same happiness of disposition must in any place and any society, secure her a great deal to enjoy and she had again a home to offer Mary; and Mary had had enough of her own friends, enough of vanity, ambition, love, and disappointment in the course of the last half year, to be in need of the true kindness of her sister's heart, and the rational tranquility of her ways. They lived to gether; and when Dr Grant had brought on apoplexy and death, by three great institutionary dinners in one week, they still lived together; for Mary, though perfectly resolved against ever at ching herself to a younger brother again, was ing in finding among the dashing representaves, or idle heir apparents, who were at the comand of her beauty, and her £20,000, any one ho could satisfy the better taste she had acnired at Mansfield, whose character and manners ould authorise a hope of the domestic happiness he had there learned to estimate, or put Edund Bertram sufficiently out of her head.

[340]

Edmund had greatly the advantage of her in is respect. He had not to wait and wish with acant affections for an object worthy to suceed her in them. Scarcely had he done regretng Mary Crawford, and observing to Fanny ow impossible it was that he should ever meet ith such another woman, before it began to rike him whether a very different kind of woan might not do just as well, or a great deal etter; whether Fanny herself were not growing s dear, as important to him in all her smiles and ll her ways, as Mary Crawford had ever been; nd whether it might not be a possible, an hopeul undertaking to persuade her that her warm nd sisterly regard for him would be foundation nough for wedded love.

I purposely abstain from dates on this occaon, that every one may be at liberty to fix their wn, aware that the cure of unconquerable pasons, and the transfer of unchanging attachments, must vary much as to time in differen people. I only intreat everybody to believe tha exactly at the time when it was quite natural tha it should be so, and not a week earlier, Edmundid cease to care about Miss Crawford, and be came as anxious to marry Fanny as Fanny her self could desire.

[341]

With such a regard for her, indeed, as his ha long been, a regard founded on the most endean ing claims of innocence and helplessness, an completed by every recommendation of growin worth, what could be more natural than th change? Loving, guiding, protecting her, as h had been doing ever since her being ten year old, her mind in so great a degree formed by h care, and her comfort depending on his kindnes an object to him of such close and peculiar inter est, dearer by all his own importance with he than any one else at Mansfield, what was then now to add, but that he should learn to prefe soft light eyes to sparkling dark ones. And be ing always with her, and always talking conf dentially, and his feelings exactly in that favour able state which a recent disappointment give those soft light eyes could not be very long i obtaining the pre-eminence.

Having once set out, and felt that he had don so on this road to happiness, there was nothin on the side of prudence to stop him or make h ogress slow; no doubts of her deserving, no ars of opposition of taste, no need of drawing w hopes of happiness from dissimilarity of mper. Her mind, disposition, opinions, and bits wanted no half concealment, no self-decepon on the present, no reliance [on] future imcovement. Even in the midst of his late infatuion, he had acknowledged Fanny's mental sueriority. What must be his sense of it now, erefore? She was of course only too good for m; but as nobody minds having what is too ood for them, he was very steadily earnest in e pursuit of the blessing, and it was not posble that encouragement from her should be long anting. Timid, anxious, doubting as she was, was still impossible that such tenderness as hers nould not, at times, hold out the strongest hope f success, though it remained for a later period tell him the whole delightful and astonishing uth. His happiness in knowing himself to have een so long the beloved of such a heart, must ave been great enough to warrant any strength f language in which he could clothe it to her or o himself; it must have been a delightful happiess. But there was happiness elsewhere which o description can reach. Let no one presume to ive the feelings of a young woman on receivng the assurance of that affection of which she as scarcely allowed herself to entertain a hope.

[342]

[343]

Their own inclinations ascertained, there were no difficulties behind, no drawback of poverty or parent. It was a match which Sir Thomas's wishes had even forestalled. Sick of ambitious and mercenary connections, prizing more and more the sterling good of principle and temper and chiefly anxious to bind by the strongest se curities all that remained to him of domestic felicity, he had pondered with genuine satisfac tion on the more than possibility of the two young friends finding their mutual consolation in each other for all that had occurred of disappointment to either; and the joyful consent which met Ed mund's application, the high sense of having realised a great acquisition in the promise of Fanny for a daughter, formed just such a contrast with his early opinion on the subject when the poor little girl's coming had been first agi tated, as time is for ever producing between the plans and decisions of mortals, for their own instruction, and their neighbours' entertainment

Fanny was indeed the daughter that he wanted His charitable kindness had been rearing a prime comfort for himself. His liberality had a rich repayment, and the general goodness of his intentions by her deserved it. He might have made her childhood happier; but it had been an error of judgment only which had given him the appearance of harshness, and deprived him of her rly love; and now, on really knowing each her, their mutual attachment became very rong. After settling her at Thornton Lacey th every kind attention to her comfort, the ject of almost every day was to see her there, to get her away from it.

[344]

Selfishly dear as she had long been to Lady ertram, she could not be parted with willingly her. No happiness of son or niece could make r wish the marriage. But it was possible to rt with her, because Susan remained to supply r place. Susan became the stationary niece, lighted to be so; and equally well adapted for by a readiness of mind, and an inclination for efulness, as Fanny had been by sweetness of mper, and strong feelings of gratitude. Susan uld never be spared. First as a comfort to anny, then as an auxiliary, and last as her subitute, she was established at Mansfield, with ery appearance of equal permanency. Her ore fearless disposition and happier nerves ade everything easy to her there. With quickess in understanding the tempers of those she id to deal with, and no natural timidity to rerain any consequent wishes, she was soon welome and useful to all; and after Fanny's reoval succeeded so naturally to her influence ver the hourly comfort of her aunt as gradually become, perhaps, the most beloved of the two.

[345]

In her usefulness, in Fanny's excellence, in Wi liam's continued good conduct and rising fam and in the general well-doing and success of the other members of the family, all assisting to a vance each other, and doing credit to his count tenance and aid, Sir Thomas saw repeated, an for ever repeated reason, to rejoice in what h had done for them all, and acknowledge the ac vantages of early hardship and discipline, an the consciousness of being born to struggle an endure.

With so much true merit and true love, and r want of fortune and friends, the happiness of the married cousins must appear as secure a earthly happiness can be. Equally formed for domestic life, and attached to country pleasure their home was the home of affection and confort; and to complete the picture of good, the acquisition of Mansfield living, by the death of Dr Grant, occurred just after they had been married long enough to begin to want an increaof income, and feel their distance from the paternal abode an inconvenience.

On that event they removed to Mansfield; ar the Parsonage there, which, under each of i two former owners, Fanny had never been ab to approach but with some painful sensation or restraint or alarm, soon grew as dear to her hear and as thoroughly perfect in her eyes, as every ing else within the view and patronage of lansfield Park had long been.

[346]

FINIS.

[347]

1681 1

33

3 1867 00015383 8

8867

823.7 AUS Austen, Jane. Mansfield Park

2

